This second edition of the Oxford English Dictionary is respectfully dedicated to

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

by her gracious permission

PREFACE

THIS second edition of the Oxford English Dictionary amalgamates the text of the first edition, published in twelve volumes in 1933, the Supplement, published in four volumes between 1972 and 1986, and approximately five thousand new words, or new senses of existing words, which have gained currency since the relevant volume of the Supplement was published. The editorial policies which informed each of the constituent parts of this edition are detailed in the Introduction, which also includes information on the way in which the task of bringing the parts together was accomplished.

The University of Oxford has the honour, with Her Majesty's gracious permission, of dedicating this edition of the Dictionary to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second. In 1897 'this historical dictionary of the English language' was dutifully dedicated by the University to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and on the completion of the first edition in 1928 it was presented to His Majesty King George the Fifth.

The aim of this Dictionary is to present in alphabetical series the words that have formed the English vocabulary from the time of the earliest records down to the present day, with all the relevant facts concerning their form, sense-history, pronunciation, and etymology. It embraces not only the standard language of literature and conversation, whether current at the moment, or obsolete, or archaic, but also the main technical vocabulary, and a large measure of dialectal usage and slang. Its basis is a collection of several millions of excerpts from literature of every period amassed by an army of readers and the editorial staff. Such a collection of evidence—it is represented by a selection of about 2,400,000 quotations actually printed—could form the only possible foundation for the historical treatment of every word and idiom which is the raison d'être of the work. It is generally recognized that the consistent pursuit of this method has worked a revolution in the art of lexicography. In 1891 a great English philologist wrote of the 'debt' which 'English grammar will some day owe to the New English Dictionary'; and the debt has been mounting up ever since. There is no aspect of English linguistic history that the Dictionary has not illuminated; its findings have called for the revision of many philological statements and the reconsideration of many judgements on textual matters. So wide is its scope and so intensive its treatment that it has served for students, both native and foreign, as a lexicon of many languages, and, though it deals primarily with words, it is virtually an encyclopaedic treasury of information about things. It has provided a ready quarry of material for many authors of treatises and dissertations. Abridgements and adaptations of it in several forms have been produced by the Oxford University Press: the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, the Concise Oxford Dictionary of Current English, the Pocket Oxford Dictionary, the Little Oxford Dictionary, and numerous dictionaries for the use of students, children, and foreign learners.

In preparing this new edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, we have received help and support from a wide range of individuals and organizations. Foremost among these were IBM United Kingdom Limited, which donated the equipment on which the text was held and manipulated, made available to us proprietary software, seconded three computer experts to assist in the development of the computer system, and maintained throughout a close involvement in the management of the project; the University of Waterloo, in Canada, which provided valuable help in the structuring of the text and was an ever-ready source of technical advice; and the Department of Trade and Industry, which provided a grant—from its Support for Innovation Fund—to help cover the cost of lexicographical research. The very professional service provided by International Computaprint Corporation in converting the text of the Oxford English Dictionary and Supplement into machine-readable form was of crucial importance.

The successful completion of the project is attributable in very large measure to the application and dedication of all those who were involved: lexicographers, computer staff, consultants, readers, library researchers, keyboarders, and proof-readers; and to the support and encouragement of the Advisory Council and Editorial Board (listed below), and of the Delegates and senior management of the Oxford University Press.

During the span of the project, the files of the Oxford Dictionaries Department continued to benefit from the labours of the directed readers, the material submitted by voluntary readers, and the resources of independently compiled collections. In particular, it received from Mrs M. Moe a gift of a large collection of quotations relating to American English, compiled by her husband, the late Colonel A. F. Moe. Significant help was received from Mr D. Barnhart, Mr R. Barnhart, and Mr B. Garner. Notable contributors included Mr S. C. Boorman, Mr G. Charters, Mr G. Chowdharay-Best, Mr C. Collier, Mrs S. Fleming, Mr F. D. Hayes, Miss C. Graves Taylor, Miss R. Mateer, Miss V. Painting, Sir Edward Playfair, Miss G. Rathbone, Mr F. R. Shapiro, Mrs K. Shock, Mr David Shulman, Mr E. Trehern, Dr P. J. Wexler, and Mrs J. K. Williams.

It is with the greatest sadness that the Co-editors record the death, in February 1988, of Miss Marghanita Laski, a steadfast friend of the OED and its Supplement over some thirty years; especially as she did not live to see the results of her work incorporated into the OED itself. The exact size of her written contribution will never be known, but has been estimated at a quarter of a million quotations.

INTRODUCTION

THIS new edition of the Oxford English Dictionary contains the whole text, unaltered in all essentials, of the twelve-volume first edition, which appeared in 1933 as a reprint of the ten-volume New English Dictionary on Historical Principles, itself originally published in parts between 1884 and 1928. It also contains the complete text of the four-volume Supplement to the Oxford English Dictionary, published between 1972 and 1986; this superseded the previous Supplement, which was issued in 1933 as a companion to the main work.

The main purpose of this second edition is to present a version of the Dictionary in which these two parts, the twelve volumes and the four volumes, are amalgamated into a continuous, seamless text. Accordingly, every article from the Supplement has been either added in its proper alphabetical position (if a wholly new entry) or merged with its corresponding OED entry (following directions which the Supplement gives but the present edition omits, as now redundant). Instead of the sixteen volumes of large but unequal size in which the previous works were issued, it has been published in twenty slimmer and evenly sized volumes, which it is hoped will prove more convenient to use.

Although the raison d'être of this new edition is the integration of the two texts, and adherence to the instructions of the Supplement, whether explicitly stated or contextually implied, is the guiding principle of the work, the material brought over from the Supplement is by no means the only feature that differentiates the second edition from the first. New vocabulary has been added, certain important general revisions, and numerous local corrections, have been made, and the whole text has been given an entirely new typographical format. It is estimated that these changes, fuller details of which are given below, have affected (in different ways) the majority of the 290,500 entries contained in this edition, including virtually all articles on the commonest words. Together they have made this edition significantly richer in information, and more modern in aspect, than its distinguished predecessors.

Whereas the Supplement can be regarded for practical purposes as up to date, it is a matter of common knowledge that many elements of the original OED require revision. That is the very purpose for which the New OED Project, of which the present work is the first printed product, was initiated. Several of these requirements have been addressed in this edition. But the full revision and updating of the Dictionary (an outline agenda for which is given in the History section below) must be regarded as a long-term goal, demanding considerable resources, and therefore to be approached in stages. This new edition represents the first, and almost certainly the most arduous, step towards that goal.

The fundamental difference between this edition and its predecessors is, by its nature, quite invisible to the user of the Dictionary. Before the compilation of this edition, the OED and Supplement, which had only ever been typeset in hot metal, were computerized. The machine-readable version of the Dictionary resulting from computerization is now the master copy from which the present printed edition has been made. It is the version to which further modifications to the Dictionary will be applied, and from which new editions and offspring works of reference will be generated in the future.

But the machine-readable text is not distinct from the printed one merely by virtue of existing in a different physical medium, electronic instead of paper, or tape rather than type; or even by its priority in the production process. Much more important, it carries a whole new world of information. This has nothing to do with supplementary text. In addition to the conventional natural-language text taken over from the printed OED and Supplement, there is another layer of information: the 'mark-up language' or tagging system. The different categories of information into which the text can be partitioned, such as headword, pronunciation, variant form, quotation, or date of quotation, are each identified accurately and unambiguously by computer tags. These tags consist of short sequences of letters, mainly mnemonic in form (e.g. 'quot' for 'quotation'), set off by delimiting characters from the conventional text which they mark. They do not appear on the printed page, but are there translated into various features of layout, typography, and punctuation. Unlike the tags, most of the latter, viewed logically, are to some degree ambiguous and redundant, though familiar and convenient to the user of the Dictionary. Thus, the tags that signify 'headword' and 'date of quotation' accompany these elements, but no instruction to print them in bold type appears in the machine-readable text; they could as easily be printed in capitals or sanserif if desired. The typographical realization of an element is relative, being determined by the requirements of the particular published form; accordingly, information of this kind has been largely, though not absolutely, purged from the electronic master text.

Only the presence of this structural information within the text has made it possible to integrate the OED and Supplement, and to perform the other systematic changes listed below, with so small a staff and in so short a time, and only because of it is the further revision and updating of the Dictionary feasible at all. It is also the prerequisite for the conversion of the OED into a publicly available electronic database. The project team believes the addition of this information to have been, without doubt, their chief contribution to the future of the Oxford English Dictionary.

SPECIAL FEATURES OF THE SECOND EDITION

The distinctive features of this edition may be described under four headings: supplementary text, general revisions, local corrections, and typographical format. These will be explained in turn.

A. SUPPLEMENTARY TEXT

1. The 69,372 entries of the four-volume Supplement have been amalgamated with the 252,259 entries of the OED, first edition. 41,752 of these entries are new and independent; the remaining 27,620 have been integrated with the corresponding OED entries. The principles that guided this process of integration are explained below.

2. Entirely new articles dealing with an additional 5,000 words, combinations, and senses, have been included and integrated; these are located chiefly in the first third of the alphabet, where the work done for the Supplement is now twenty years or more old. The policy and history of this part of the project are set out below.

3. The 260 addenda and 83 spurious entries appended to Volume XII of the first edition have here been merged with the main text.

4. 560 corrections, being chiefly earlier illustrative examples, which were prepared for Volumes I and II of the Supplement but not inserted there, have been included here.

5. The process of integration has from time to time required that a lexical item, treated as a subordinate part of an entry in the OED or Supplement, should be elevated to the status of a main entry, and this has naturally entailed the writing of new text.

B. GENERAL REVISIONS

1. IPA and stress-marked headwords. The system devised by Sir James Murray for representing pronunciation, used in both the first edition of the OED and the Supplement, has now been replaced throughout the text by the International Phonetic Alphabet. Many headwords and lexical items in the two parent works had their stress-pattern marked by symbols placed within them, instead of being followed by a phonetic transcription; these marks, which are placed after the stressed vowel, have been replaced by IPA stress-marks, which are placed before the stressed syllable. The principles of transcription and translation followed here are described below, pp. xxxiii–xxxiv.

2. Foreign script. In its etymological material, the first edition regularly cited foreign words in non-roman scripts; besides Greek, cited forms in Arabic script, the Cyrillic alphabet, Devanagari, the square Hebrew alphabet, and the Syriac script are quite usual. These were normally, but not universally, accompanied by transliterations. Except when citing Greek, the Supplement abandoned this practice, giving only transliterations. It was decided to follow the latter's practice in the present edition, considering that the dropping of the scripts would be more straightforward than the furnishing of accurate new non-roman forms, and that the first edition itself frequently neglected to supply the non-roman forms. Transcriptions have been supplied wherever they were missing in the first edition.

In quotations the presence of foreign script is, of course, an intrinsic feature; it has been preserved as far as possible, subject to the constraints upon 'artwork' and special characters in general (see below).

3. Illustration and special characters. The parent texts resort from time to time to the inclusion of what amount to pictorial illustrations, mainly diagrammatic or typographic in style. In the first edition a number of names for typefaces are typographically illustrated, and a few other concepts are conveyed diagrammatically. These have been omitted. Other more modest forms of illustration, which involve the use of individual special characters such as occur or might reasonably be expected to occur in the Dictionary, have been retained.

Between them, the two parent texts make use of approximately 660 characters apart from the ninety or so available on the typical keyboard. Virtually all of these have been retained, and some previously wrong have been corrected.

4. Ordering of entries. The alphabetical arrangement of entries in the OED and Supplement is to some extent affected by the presence of special characters, accents, punctuation, and capitalization within the headword. The principles which prevail, but are not universally followed, in the parent texts have been standardized throughout the present edition. As a result, certain details in the identification of some entries differ from their counterparts in the parent texts, and a few of these have consequently been removed some distance from their former position.

5. Ordering of senses. The sense-divisions of most entries in the first edition and its Supplement follow a very clear system of structural organization, as described below, p. xxxiii. The system has been extended to the few scattered entries which were (usually for no special reason) irregular in structure.

Entries in which a series of senses skips or duplicates a number, owing to simple editorial or typographical oversight, have been corrected.

6. Cross-references. Cross-references whose targets were changed as a result of the integration of OED and Supplement entries have been emended as far as possible. These changes reflect the changes to the identifying structure of an entry, listed below, p. xviii.

Many of the 580,000 cross-references in the Dictionary are imprecise, citing headwords without parts of speech and homonym numbers, for example. It was impossible for the automatic cross-referencing system to determine which of two or more possible targets was the one proper to an ambiguous cross-reference of this sort, and so, on the whole, these have not been made more precise; in many cases, the intended target is obvious to the reader, and amplification would merely be fussy. There were also a fair number of cross-references which, as printed, did not match any existing headword; this was nearly always because of a slight difference in spelling. Most of these have been emended in the present edition.

C. LOCAL CORRECTIONS

1. The spelling of vocabulary items. Certain conventions of spelling, as also of capitalization, hyphenation, and punctuation, have changed since the publication of the first edition; indeed the occurrence of some such changes is evidenced within the Dictionary itself. Harmonization of the whole text with currently acceptable style would have been impossible within the limits of this new edition. The Supplement, however, indicated many changes to the spelling of headwords, which have, of course, been effected; and an attempt has been made to carry such changes through into derivatives and combinations of the main words and into contiguous definitions. Other such updatings, overlooked by the Supplement, are carried out wherever possible.

2. The main text of Dictionary entries. Innumerable small misprints and slips have naturally been encountered, during editing, in the definitions, etymologies, and notes which form the core of the Dictionary text. These have been corrected.

3. Quotations. The text of quotations has been carefully protected from corruption. The working assumption was that it always correctly reproduces the original source, however strangely it may read. Nevertheless, an appreciable number of quotations came under suspicion of inaccuracy, or could be clearly seen to have suffered mutilation at the hands of compositors, and were checked and corrected from the sources.

It was a basic, and not unreasonable, requirement of our automatic processing that quotations (with certain regular exceptions, such as those from Beowulf) must begin with a date. Dates (sometimes only approximate) were supplied by means of bibliographical investigation to the small number of quotations that were found to lack them.

D. TYPOGRAPHICAL CHANGES

1. Entry spacing. In the first edition, no spacing separates entries one from another. This edition follows the Supplement in placing space between entries. Series of entries for variant and obsolete forms are treated in the same way, not run on as they often are in the first edition.

2. Distinction between main and subordinate entries. The typographical distinction in the first edition between main words and subordinate words, by which the latter were printed in a lighter bold type, has been given up in this edition, as it had already in the Supplement. Such a distinction is difficult to draw absolutely and is, in any case, of doubtful utility.

3. Distinction between headword and other bold elements. Besides the distinction between two kinds of headword just described, the first edition used other varieties of bold type to identify derivatives, combinations, and variant forms of the headword, when cited within the same entry. Derivatives were usually printed in dark bold similar to, but smaller than, that of the headword, while combinations and variant forms were printed in a lighter bold. The Supplement used only a single typeface to distinguish all three from the headword. In this edition derivatives and combinations are printed in a dark bold, smaller than the headword, and variant spellings are printed in a light bold. It seemed logical to symbolize in the same way what are, in effect, subordinated headwords, but to differentiate them from the variant spellings of the main headword.

4. Italicized vocabulary items. The text of a Dictionary definition contains numerous elements printed in italics, which fall into several different categories of information: chiefly usage label, cross-reference, cited linguistic form, and lexical item (such as phrase or minor combination). This last element is of particular importance since, like the headword, derivative, or bold combination, it constitutes one of the keys by which the reader finds the information which he or she is seeking. Since this kind of element is specially marked by tags in the electronic version of the text, it seemed helpful to print it in this edition in a special bold italic typeface, clearly setting it off from all other italicized text.

5. Capitalization of headwords. In the first edition of the OED, every main headword was given a capital initial, regardless of whether the word was normally so written. Most derivatives, and many combinations, were also capitalized. The Supplement, in accord with modern lexicographical practice, abandoned this convention, giving a capital only where that is the normal spelling. This edition follows the Supplement's practice.

For many words capitalization varies, either at different dates or in different senses. Because its convention disguised the problem, the OED often did not indicate the prevailing or preferred style. Where the intentions of the first edition were not deducible, as often with rare and obsolete words, decisions about capitalization were made on the basis of the printed quotations or analogy with similar and related words, or both.

6. Abbreviations in initial letter entries. Only a small number of abbreviations (i.e. initialisms) were listed under the entries for initial letters in the first edition. In line with recent linguistic developments, these lists were greatly augmented by the Supplement. But though these abbreviations have definitions, they are not picked out typographically in the parent texts. In this edition they are printed in bold type for easy identification.

7. Asterisks in quotation paragraphs and cross-references. In the Dictionary, quotations illustrating a series of combinations can be listed either in one chronological sequence, or (as is usual when the combinations are defined) in a series of chronological sequences, each illustrating one combination and all arranged in the alphabetical order of the combinations. In the first edition, an asterisk was placed in the first quotation of each sequence, marking the combination being illustrated. In the Supplement, this convention was not followed, because asterisks were used to mark two other features: sense numbers that were to be intercalated into the OED sequence, and cross-references to entries in the Supplement. As a result of integration, the latter conventions have disappeared; but also, many quotation series without asterisks from the Supplement have been merged with series with asterisks from the OED. In these cases, the asterisking convention has been carried through the whole merged quotation paragraph. It has not, however, been introduced into every paragraph of this kind originating in the Supplement alone.

8. Hyphenation. Unlike its parent texts, this edition has been printed without regular line-end hyphenation. Most of the hyphens printed are true ('hard') hyphens. This has the advantage that no extraneous hyphens are introduced into lexical items, variant forms, or other linguistic forms cited in the text. It also means that virtually no merely line-end ('soft') hyphens have been introduced into the text of quotations. Though this results in a less even layout of text on the page than in the parent texts, it is felt that the advantages outweigh this drawback.

When the text of quotations from the Dictionary was keyboarded, hyphens occurring at line endings had to be either dropped or retained (as 'hard' hyphens). Without consulting the original works from which the quotations were drawn, it was sometimes impossible to decide which would be correct, even after considering the date of the quotation, the evidence of the other quotations from the same work, and so on. In order to avoid a misleading decision, a special symbol (-) has been used to replace the hyphen of the parent text. This symbol indicates nothing more than the ambiguity of the hyphen in the parent text. It is also occasionally used to split a bold or italic combination, a derivative, or a word employed in a definition, for the sake of a line-break: in such cases, it is to be understood to indicate that the word is not normally written with a hyphen.

PRINCIPLES OF INTEGRATION

The integration of the text of the Supplement into that of the first edition of the OED (referred to below as 'the OED' for brevity's sake) was carried out in two stages. The major processes were performed automatically by computer programs specifically developed for the purpose. Printouts of the resulting merged entries were then edited by lexicographers, and the emendations marked on them were entered by keyboarders into the computer.

The guiding principle of both stages of the integration process was that the intentions of the Supplement should be faithfully followed unless there were very good reasons for departing from them.

INDEPENDENT ENTRIES

About 42,000 main entries in the Supplement were new and independent. They were put into their appropriate place in the alphabetical sequence.

A new entry having a headword with the same spelling and part of speech as one or more in the OED already had a different homonym number: it was placed after its OED homonym(s). If there was only one homonym in the OED, this was given the homonym number 1. A new entry having a headword with the same spelling but a different part of speech was placed in an appropriate position among the pre-existing entries, usually towards the end of the sequence (see the principles of entry ordering, p. xxxii below); where only a noun ('substantive') or nouns occurred in the OED, they had no explicit part of speech: the part of speech 'sb.' was supplied.

Many combinations and derivatives treated, in the first edition, within the entries for the main words on which they are formed were elevated to the status of main words in the Supplement. The usual reason for this was a significant increase in the complexity of the senses of the word or its general acceptance as more than a casual or obvious compound of the root word. A certain number of forms treated as graphic or spoken variants of a main word in the first edition were similarly registered as separate, independent words in the Supplement. When such upgrading occurred, the material relating to the word in the first edition was not reprinted in full in the new entry; instead, cross-references were used to direct the reader to the definition, etymology, or quotation in question, implying that it was now part of the new entry. Accordingly, in the integrated text this original material has been moved (with appropriate editing) to the new position. Much effort has been devoted to detecting overlapping entries of this sort, many of which are extremely well disguised, especially when linked by only a single, inconspicuous quotation.

A certain number of Supplement entries directed the reader to delete the existing Dictionary entry and substitute a new one, the text of which then follows. Not infrequently, these entries also borrowed snatches of text from the former entry, especially the quotations given there. Before the original entries were discarded, the borrowed text was transferred to the new entries.

There were also entries in the Supplement which added further information to a different main word in the first edition, but nevertheless did not require a new entry to be created. There were two principal kinds. First, where the entry for a main word in the first edition had a derivative listed under it and the only addition to that entry in the Supplement related to the derivative, the latter was given, as it were, the temporary status of a main word solely for the purposes of supplementation. In such cases, the new material has been accommodated within the framework of the original main entry and the supplementary one has been discarded. Secondly, a variant form of a main word could be treated in a separate entry with illustrative quotations, because the variant in question either had not been listed and illustrated under the principal form, or had recently become recognized as the predominant spelling. In both cases the intention was that the two entries should be merged, in the latter with a change of spelling in the headword. Again, detecting such pairs of entries (and some forming larger groups) has been very difficult, especially as the spelling variation can bridge widely separated parts of the Dictionary (C and K, or E and Œ, for example), a factor which has occasionally frustrated the fulfilment of the Supplement's intentions.

MATCHING ENTRIES

The remaining 28,000 entries in the Supplement had counterparts in the OED with which they were integrated. Four basic procedures were followed, in line with the main instructions to the user included in each entry: addition, deletion, transference, and substitution. Naturally not every one of the thousands of occasions when any of these changes was made is explicitly indicated in the text, but the intentions are nearly always quite clear.

In the headword section of the entry (the identification), the usual supplementary material consisted of a pronunciation or one or more variant forms or inflexions. Deletions were mainly of status labels (especially 'obsolete'). Transference of labels into a sense section was common. Substitution of a different spelling of the headword or a modified label occurred from time to time.

Etymologies were occasionally added or modified by deletion or substitution.

In the signification, additions made up the bulk of the changes occasioned by the Supplement. Where a complete new sense section was added, its numbering normally indicated the correct position. If the first edition had only one sense section at that level in the hierarchy, the absent sense number or letter (the first in the series: A, 1, a, or (a)) was supplied. Supplement sense sections introduced by starred numbers were added at the appropriate point in the sequence, and the ensuing sense divisions were renumbered to accommodate them. When a section division (headed by a capital letter), covering the use of a word in a new grammatical category, was added at the end of an entry, the identification was altered to include the new part of speech. Sections containing derivatives were added at the end of the entry.

Supplementary material was frequently added to definitions; this was commonly made plain by the introductory word 'also', which sometimes became superfluous and was edited out. Occasions when the new material could merely be added, without modification, at the end of the existing definition were relatively rare. Often the new material had to be inserted within the old, or the whole rewritten into one definition. The domain of a label had sometimes to be restricted to cover only the intended portion of the definition. So multifarious were the modifications that the results can scarcely be distinguished from the deletions, transferences, and substitutions indicated from time to time by the Supplement.

The parts of the Dictionary which the Supplement especially augmented are the sections in which defined and undefined combinations are listed. Considerable labour was required to merge the corresponding lists (usually in alphabetical order). The defined combinations, resembling as they do complete entries in miniature, were susceptible to supplementation, deletion, modification, and substitution in any of their constituent parts. Their alphabetical sorting and rough merging was achieved automatically, but much work remained for editorial attention.

The addition of quotations was very frequent: when an entirely new sense-division was added, with its own group of quotations, when a sense section was supplemented, and as the sole modification to a sense section. In most cases this was a straightforward operation. Paragraphs of quotations that illustrate combinations, however, usually consist of a series, arranged alphabetically to correspond with the combinations, of short chronological sequences of quotations; the accurate fusing of parallel series of these was a complicated operation, requiring careful editing, both on paper and at the screen.

CROSS-REFERENCES

Integration of the Supplement with the main Dictionary text involved an enormous number of changes to the 'addresses' at which sections of text were located: namely, to the form of the headword, the part of speech associated with it, the homonym number distinguishing otherwise identical main words, or the number or letter identifying the sense-division under which a definition, combination, or quotation could be found. As a result, there was a danger that many cross-references would become invalid, since the elements to which they pointed would now be differently identified. This was countered by a twofold strategy. A computer program caused every change to the 'address' of an element brought about by the process of automatic integration to be applied to the cross-references which cited that address. Editorial staff subsequently ensured that changes made by them were logged and then applied to the corresponding cross-references. Inevitably, a few cross-references escaped both systems, including those in early volumes which were already passed for press before editorial changes that would affect them had been made in later volumes. There are around 600,000 cross-references in the OED, of which well over 20,000 have been adjusted in response to integration, and many more have been corrected or rendered more precise.

THE TRANSLATION OF THE PHONETIC SYSTEM

The system of phonetic transcription devised by Sir James Murray for use in the first edition and followed, for the sake of consistency, in the Supplement is a subtle and flexible means of recording English pronunciation. But many of the effects for which Murray strove in the design of his system were realized, not long afterwards, in the International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA). It seems very possible that, if the IPA had already achieved full development and widespread acceptance at the time that Murray was beginning work on the Dictionary, he would have adopted it instead of a system of his own. It was therefore logical to consider replacing Murray's system with IPA throughout the Dictionary. IPA has the advantage that it is very widely accepted and understood, and can be used to represent the sounds as well of regional and dialect English and foreign languages as of standard English. Indeed its introduction was regarded by many whom the project team consulted as among the highest priorities. It was decided that the change should be made for the present edition, rather than left until a future revision phase. But for reasons of historical interest, the Murray transcriptions have been retained in the electronic version alongside the IPA ones, the latter only having been printed.

A notable feature of the Dictionary is that obsolete main words, derivatives, and certain variant forms and combinations are not given phonetic transcriptions but have their stress-pattern indicated: the stress-dots (which are placed after the accented vowel, just as they are within the transcriptions) are printed within the body of the word or form. Naturally consistency required that the stress-dots within these forms should also be altered to IPA stress-marks (which are placed before the beginning of the accented syllable).

The short time available meant that there had to be rather strict limitations on the extent of the changes made. For native English words the variety of pronunciation represented is, broadly speaking, educated standard southern British, or 'Received Pronunciation' (RP). There could be no question, at this stage, of systematically registering non-RP (i.e. other British and non-British) pronunciations; although of course those already included in the Dictionary have remained and have been augmented by a few analogous cases. Again, pronunciation variants within RP, apart from those already registered in the Dictionary, could not be researched and documented, except as the evident need to include them arose in the course of the other editing. The adding of up-to-date pronunciations, except when prescribed by the Supplement, had to be kept to a minimum, for the same reasons. Essentially, a straightforward literal translation from the Murray system to IPA has been attempted, accompanied by correction of the errors inevitably arising from that process.

The method by which the translation of the Murray system to IPA was performed can be briefly summarized. As much of the translation as possible was carried out automatically by computer. The computer had to operate on two kinds of material: sequences of phonetic characters, and normal English words containing dots indicating the position of the stress accent. First, the program identified the strings of characters which it was required to process. It used the mark-up tags to do this. Then the actual translation was run. The program referred to three tables, one giving IPA equivalents for Murray's phonetic symbols (or groups of them); one giving rules that showed whether each IPA symbol is a vowel, a consonant, or a consonant cluster; and one giving similar rules for ordinary English spelling. The second and third table enabled the computer to deduce the correct position for an IPA stress-mark from the existing stress-dot in the text. Certain characters and groups were known in advance to have more than one possible IPA equivalent. These were printed out on a special report, as were all pronunciations in which the conversion failed; and from these, corrections were made at the keyboard. Altogether, 137,152 phonetic transcriptions and 137,274 stress-marked words were automatically translated.

A considerable number of phonetic transcriptions are found in other parts of an entry than the pronunciation key. These were not originally identified by the computer, and so a separate program was run in order to register them on a list for editorial transcription.

The conversion of Murray's phonetic system to IPA was not entirely straightforward. The peculiar nature of the system, the way in which it is applied both in general and in particular cases, and the historical variety of English speech which it was employed to record, all presented obstacles to the smooth application of the scheme of translation.

The peculiarities of Murray's phonetic alphabet can be ascribed to the time and circumstances of its devising.[1] It must here suffice to enumerate a few of its characteristics. It is used indiscriminately both for phonetic and phonemic transcription: that is, it is a set of symbols employed to represent both the members of the particular set of sounds that constitute the phonology of English, and the much larger set of infinitesimally differing sounds from all other phonologies to which reference is made in the Dictionary. As a means of representing standard English pronunciation, Murray's system is sensitive and generally lucid. It is less well-adapted for the transcription of dialectal and foreign words. Shift had often to be made with the limited range of typographical shapes that Murray had devised at the outset in order to transcribe unexpected foreign sounds. Symbols not listed in the original pronunciation key appeared during the progress of the Dictionary. Uncommon foreign sounds were handled differently on widely separated occasions.

With regard to consonants, there are few drawbacks to Murray's system, apart from the dearth of symbols for foreign sounds. Indeed, all but one of the primary consonant symbols correspond exactly to the set employed for English in the IPA. A fundamental feature of the vowel system that does not translate easily into IPA is its analysis into 'ordinary', 'long', and 'obscure' vowels. Broadly, the same list of symbols appears under each heading, but (respectively) without a diacritical accent, accented with a macron (long mark), and accented with a breve (short mark). The implication is that the same underlying vowel manifests itself in three guises; and, further, that these guises are determined at least partly by its relationship to the stress accent of the word. The theory underlying the obscure vowels is that, if they were accorded stress, as they sometimes are in song or very careful enunciation, they would resemble their ordinary equivalents. This principle, though something like it is encountered in phonological theories, is not usually embodied in the standard IPA transcriptions used in dictionaries. If, as has here been done, it is set aside, then most of the obscure vowels are equivalent to the IPA ə ('schwa'; the sound of a in sofa, particular); while a few are translated into ɪ (the sound of e in hatchet). The main peculiarity of the long vowel series is that diphthongs are included in it; but this is an oddity of phonetic theory—the analysis of English diphthongs as long vowels followed by 'glides'—rather than an obstacle to translation.

The major problem arises in the 'ordinary' vowel series, which contains both vowels universally recognized as lacking length—the i of pin, for example—and vowels now normally transcribed as long vowels. These, in fact, are the members of the long series in another guise: a guise apparently taken on in a syllable under low stress. So, for example, the vowel of the second syllable of Matthew is an ordinary vowel, while that of few is long. Most classifications would treat them as identical. This would not pose a major problem of translation, if it were not that the same symbols employed for the second vowel of Matthew and its parallels throughout the vowel system (hero, Psyche, etc.) are also used to represent the principal vowels of the European languages—roughly speaking, the so-called 'cardinal vowels'. The two sets of vowels are not phonetically identical, or even close, and were not in Murray's time. Such symbols as these (along with some others) were straightforwardly ambiguous, and could not be translated correctly in every case by the computer.

Because Murray's system uses many of the same symbols for English and foreign vowel sounds, it was necessary to depart from certain conventions that are common in the transcription adopted by English dictionaries. A notable example is the use of (ɛ) for the vowel of bed in place of the more usual (e), because the English vowel is, for most English ears, closer to the cardinal open vowel of French faire or German Bär than to the cardinal narrow vowel of French bébé or German Schnee.

The variety of English pronunciation recorded by the Murray transcription is extremely 'precise', conservative, and (in present-day terms) old-fashioned. Most of its peculiar characteristics are systematic (they permeate the phonology) rather than occasional (features of the pronunciation of particular words, or groups of words). They are systematic enough for a phonetician to predict the way in which individual words will be transcribed, but not enough to make it easy for a computer to efface them all automatically. This is one reason why they have largely been retained in this edition. A second reason is that they constitute a useful record of one variety of English pronunciation in a particular period; and a third is that, for the general user, most of them are merely small nuances for which one can make allowance.

The chief phonological features that set the pronunciation represented in the Dictionary apart from most present-day phonetic descriptions of English are the following:

1. The stressed close vowels (iː, uː) are maintained in words like idea, realize, museum, skua, in contrast with the diphthongs (ɪə, ʊə) of dear, rear, secure.
2. The close vowels (iː, uː) are maintained in unstressed syllables in words like delineate, creation, perpetual, graduate, in contrast with the open vowels (ɪ, ʊ) of genius, demonic, circulate.

 It is in such syllables that the Murray transcription uses 'ordinary' vowels, not long ones. It is quite likely, therefore, that Murray was aware of no distinction in duration between these vowels, but it is also clear from the consistency with which the distinction is observed that he was aware of, or believed in, a distinction of vowel quality (specifically, of tension). The conventional IPA transcription, however, observes only a phonemic distinction between open vowels, which are treated as 'short', and narrow vowels, which are accorded symbols of length as well. The IPA transcriptions therefore convey the misleading implication that such vowels have, or had, greater duration.

3. Diphthongs (e.g., əʊ) are maintained in unstressed syllables in words like homographic, protocol, in contrast with the obscure vowel 'schwa' in words like homonym, melody.
4. Unstressed medial obscure vowels are not represented as having been elided, e.g. in veterinary.
5. A distinction is maintained between syllabic consonants and a sequence of obscure vowel and consonant, so that words like principle and principal are distinguished.
6. A distinction is drawn between a diphthong (ɔə) in words like glory, boarder, mourning, and a long vowel (ɔː) in words like saurian, border, and morning. This is not generally maintained in present-day IPA.
7. The nineteenth-century lengthening of the rounded low back vowel of words like soft, cloth, and cross is recorded (in this edition, as a separate variant; in the first edition, by a special symbol indicating the possibility of either pronunciation).

NEW VOCABULARY

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The decision to include in this edition some five thousand new items of vocabulary was taken in the light of several considerations. First, the pace of lexical innovation is rapid, and every dictionary must be continually enlarged or revised to accommodate the many new words and senses which become part of the language each year. Secondly, the compilation of new entries is a discrete editorial activity on which work could start straight away, independent of the revision which is envisaged as the business of subsequent phases of the project. Thirdly, as work on the Supplement came to an end, staff who were skilled in the compilation of OED entries, and a research base, in the form of a large quotation file, library researchers, consultants, etc., became available. Fourthly, other Oxford dictionaries, notably the Shorter OED, the Concise Oxford Dictionary, and the Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary, then in the process of revision, needed a selection of fully-researched new entries; this could be produced most efficiently by a central unit supplying material both to the New OED project and to other dictionaries.

Editorial work on new vocabulary began in 1983. It was recognized at the outset that the bulk of the material would lie in the early section of the alphabet. The lexical changes of the period (between ten and twenty years) since this part of the Supplement was prepared were yet to be recorded; moreover, the Supplement's coverage of the vocabulary already in use at that period was limited both by the relatively modest scale on which the work was initially planned and by the extent of the collections, which were inevitably small in the early stages. In this it resembled, though for different reasons, the earlier Supplement of 1933, of which R. W. Chapman wrote: 'We projected accordingly . . . a wedge-shaped Supplement, designed to bring the work to an even date; it is, so to speak, all ABC and no XYZ.' But this asymmetry was a condition of the material being treated; there was no constraint on the editorial operation that confined it to one part of the alphabet. On the contrary, the storage of the material on the New OED database meant that very recent coinages from any point in the alphabet could as readily be accommodated.

SELECTION AND EDITING OF NEW MATERIAL

The large quotation file maintained by the Oxford English Dictionaries Department was the basis for selecting items for inclusion in this edition, as it had been both for the first edition and for the Supplement. It offered, as before, the most comprehensive and objective basis for the selection of vocabulary items and the provision of supporting evidence. The file was growing at the rate of some 120,000 quotations per year, collected predominantly by means of a reading programme covering books, magazines, etc., representing the main varieties of English used throughout the world, but enhanced by scholarly contributions of specific new information, earlier illustrative quotations, and other lexicographical material.

But new resources had become available to lexicographers during the previous decade. Perhaps the most important were the large computer databases containing research abstracts, newspaper and periodical texts, and legal reports. At first, computer-readable texts were used mainly to generate concordances. By the 1980s it was also possible, by rapidly searching the extensive text held on these databases, to pin down specific uses of individual words or phrases. These databases proved invaluable in tracing early uses of terms, in providing examples to complete the lexicographical record, and in supplying etymological information.

The databases of the 1980s rarely helped in the actual selection of new words for inclusion in the Dictionary. Inclusion was normally suggested by other means (such as evidence in the quotation file); the databases were used subsequently to provide additional information and to confirm the currency of the word or sense. It should also be stressed that these resources had to be used with some caution, as they might contain only recent text, or examples of English from only one area (notably North America), and they lacked the ability to identify the meaning in which a word was used in a given context or to distinguish it from the other meanings of that word. They did not, therefore, always provide a foundation for generalized, objective judgements on a particular linguistic or lexicographical point, but rather offered subsidiary evidence.

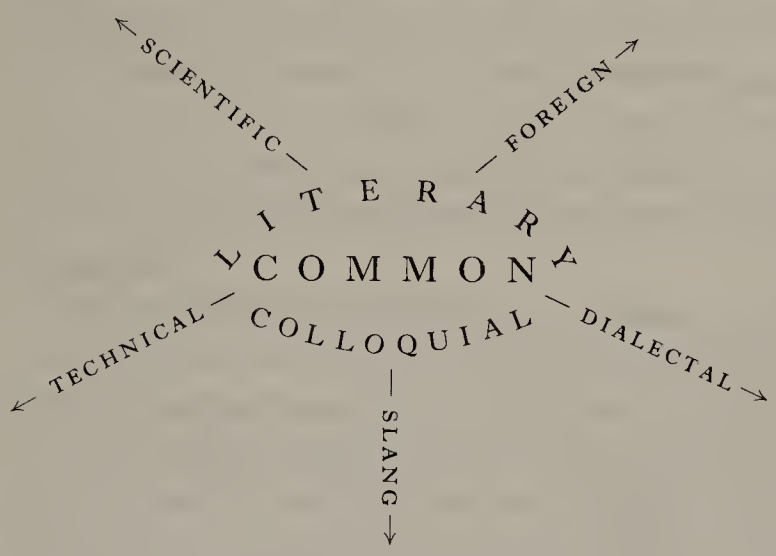
During the preparation of this edition, there was a general increase in interest in new words among lexicographers and their readers, particularly in North America and Great Britain. The two Barnhart Dictionaries of New English and their quarterly Companion presented well-researched material on neologisms. The Merriam-Webster Dictionaries published their record of new vocabulary in book form. Advance publicity for new dictionaries appearing throughout the world provided lists of the neologisms included in them. These were all valuable pointers to items that need to be included in the OED. And as ever, personal observation by members of the Dictionary Department and other contributors (the historical dictionary's own style of 'oral evidence') was a prolific source of further suggestions.

The selection of new words now included in the Dictionary is not intended to represent simply the emergent vocabulary of the last few years. To have selected solely according to this criterion would have highlighted terms which might not have achieved an established footing in the language, at the expense of other, older words. Indeed, one of the engaging aspects of historical lexicography is that terms which are held to be of recent origin often turn out to have existed for many years, though without achieving general currency. Recent neologisms have not been excluded, but have had to compete for their places alongside other candidates. In general, terms from most of the varieties of English are added, though the majority are current in American or British English, or in both. The vocabularies of modern computer technology, medicine, politics, economics, and popular culture are well represented, though not at the cost of terms from less obtrusive realms. Omission should not be equated with exclusion; a simple practical limit had to be set in accordance with the number of items that could be prepared in time for this edition.

There is no major difference between the editorial policy of the Supplement and that followed in the preparation of the further new entries; they are no more than an extension of the Supplement on a smaller scale, integrated, like the latter, into the main text of the Dictionary. In so far as these new entries have been compiled in accordance with the overall editorial policy of the second edition, they naturally embody a certain number of differences from the style of the Supplement. The stylistic changes have been described above, pp. xii–xvi. It was the policy of the Supplement to include earlier, further, and later examples of words and senses already in the Dictionary. This provision, being quite distinct from the addition of new entries, was not continued after the completion of the Supplement, but was deferred until such time as the full revision of the Dictionary may begin.

STATISTICS

This edition of the Oxford English Dictionary contains about 290,500 main entries, or about 38,000 (15 per cent) more than in the first edition. The extent of the text, however, has grown from around 44 million words to around 59 million, which represents an increase of 34 per cent. There are 350 million printed characters in this work. In addition to the headwords of main entries, the Dictionary contains 157,000 combinations and derivatives in bold type, and 169,000 phrases and combinations in bold italic type, making a total of 616,500 word-forms. There are 137,000 pronunciations, 249,300 etymologies, 577,000 cross-references, and 2,412,400 illustrative quotations.



GENERAL EXPLANATIONS

THE VOCABULARY

THE vocabulary of a widely diffused and highly cultivated living language is not a fixed quantity circumscribed by definite limits. That vast aggregate of words and phrases which constitutes the vocabulary of English-speaking people presents, to the mind that endeavours to grasp it as a definite whole, the aspect of one of those nebulous masses familiar to the astronomer, in which a clear and unmistakable nucleus shades off on all sides, through zones of decreasing brightness, to a dim marginal film that seems to end nowhere, but to lose itself imperceptibly in the surrounding darkness. In its constitution it may be compared to one of those natural groups of the zoologist or botanist, wherein typical species forming the characteristic nucleus of the order, are linked on every side to other species, in which the typical character is less and less distinctly apparent, till it fades away in an outer fringe of aberrant forms, which merge imperceptibly in various surrounding orders, and whose own position is ambiguous and uncertain. For the convenience of classification, the naturalist may draw the line which bounds a class or order outside or inside of a particular form; but Nature has drawn it nowhere. So the English vocabulary contains a nucleus or central mass of many thousand words whose 'Anglicity' is unquestioned; some of them only literary, some of them only colloquial, the great majority at once literary and colloquial—they are the common words of the language. But they are linked on every side with other words which are less and less entitled to this appellation, and which pertain ever more and more distinctly to the domain of local dialect, of the slang and cant of 'sets' and classes, of the peculiar technicalities of trades and processes, of the scientific terminology common to all civilized nations, and of the actual languages of other lands and peoples. And there is absolutely no defining line in any direction: the circle of the English language has a well-defined centre but no discernible circumference.[1] Yet practical utility has some bounds, and a dictionary has definite limits: lexicographers must, like naturalists, 'draw the line somewhere', in each diverging direction. They must include all the 'common words' of literature and conversation, and such of the scientific, technical, slang, dialectal, and foreign words as are passing into common use and approach the position or standing of 'common words', well knowing that the line which they draw will not satisfy all their critics. For the domain of 'common words' widens out in the direction of one's own reading, research, business, provincial or foreign residence, and contracts in the direction with which one has no practical connection: no one's English is all English. The lexicographer must be satisfied to exhibit the greater part of the vocabulary of each one, which will be immensely more than the whole vocabulary of any one.

In addition to, and behind, the common vocabulary, in all its diverging lines, lies an infinite number of proper or merely denotative names, outside the province of lexicography, yet touching it in thousands of points, at which these names, and still more the adjectives and verbs formed upon them, acquire more or less of connotative value. Here also limits more or less arbitrary must be assumed.

The language presents yet another undefined frontier, when it is viewed in relation to time. The living vocabulary is no more permanent in its constitution than definite in its extent. It is not today what it was a century ago, still less what it will be a century hence. Its constituent elements are in a state of slow but incessant dissolution and renovation. 'Old words' are ever becoming obsolete and dying out; 'new words' are continually pressing in. And the death of a word is not an event of which the date can be readily determined. It is a vanishing process, extending over a lengthened period, of which contemporaries never see the end. Our own words never become obsolete: it is always the words of our grandfathers that have died with them. Even after we cease to use a word, the memory of it survives, and the word itself survives as a possibility;

[1] The above diagram will explain itself, as an attempt to express to the eye the aspect in which the vocabulary is here presented, and also some of the relations of its elements typical and aberrant. The centre is occupied by the 'common' words, in which literary and colloquial usage meet. 'Scientific' and 'foreign' words enter the common language mainly through literature; 'slang' words ascend through colloquial use; the 'technical' terms of crafts and processes, and the 'dialect' words, blend with the common language both in speech and literature. Slang also touches on one side the technical terminology of trades and occupations, as in 'nautical slang', 'Public School slang', 'the slang of the Stock Exchange', and on another passes into true dialect. Dialects similarly pass into foreign languages. Scientific terminology passes on one side into purely foreign words, on another it blends with the technical vocabulary of art and manufactures. It is not possible to fix the point at which the 'English language' stops, along any of these diverging lines.

it is only when no one is left to whom its use is still possible, that the word is wholly dead. Hence, there are many words of which it is doubtful whether they are still to be considered as part of the living language; they are alive to some speakers, and dead to others. And, on the other hand, there are many claimants to admission into the recognized vocabulary (where some of them will certainly one day be received), that are already current coin with some speakers and writers, and not yet 'good English', or even not English at all, to others.

If we treat the division of words into current and obsolete as a subordinate one, and extend our idea of the language so as to include all that has been English from the beginning, or from any particular epoch, we enter upon a department of the subject of which, from the nature of the case, our exhibition must be imperfect. For the vocabulary of past times is known to us solely from its preservation in written records; the extent of our knowledge of it depends entirely upon the completeness of the records, and the completeness of our acquaintance with them. And the farther back we go, the more imperfect are the records, the smaller is the fragment of the actual vocabulary that we can recover.

Subject to the conditions which thus encompass every attempt to construct a complete English Dictionary, the present work aims at exhibiting the history and signification of the English words now in use, or known to have been in use since the middle of the twelfth century. This date has been adopted as the only natural halting-place, short of going back to the beginning, so as to include the entire Old English or 'Anglo-Saxon' vocabulary. To do this would have involved the inclusion of an immense number of words, not merely long obsolete but also having obsolete inflexions, and thus requiring, if dealt with at all, a treatment different from that adapted to the words which survived the twelfth century. For not only was the stream of English literature then reduced to the tiniest thread (the slender annals of the Old English or Anglo-Saxon Chronicle being for nearly a century its sole representative), but the vast majority of the ancient words that were destined not to live into modern English, comprising the entire scientific, philosophical, and poetical vocabulary of Old English, had already disappeared, and the old inflexional and grammatical system had been levelled to one so essentially modern as to require no special treatment in the Dictionary. Hence, we exclude all words that had become obsolete by 1150. But to words actually included this date has no application; their history is exhibited from their first appearance, however early.

Within these chronological limits, it is the aim of the Dictionary to deal with all the common words of speech and literature, and with all words which approach these in character; the limits being extended farther in the domain of science and philosophy, which naturally passes into that of literature, than in that of slang or cant, which touches the colloquial. In scientific and technical terminology, the aim of the first edition was to include all words English in form, except those of which an explanation would be unintelligible to any but the specialist; and such words, not English in form, as either were in general use, like hippopotamus, geranium, aluminium, focus, stratum, bronchitis, or belonged to the more familiar language of science, as Mammalia, Lepidoptera, Invertebrata. The policy governing the selection of the scientific terms included in the Supplement and added to this edition is considerably broader:

> Lexicographers are now confronted with the problem of treating the vocabularies of subjects that are changing at a rate and on a scale not hitherto known. The complexity of many scientific subjects is such too that it is no longer possible to define all the terms in a manner that is comprehensible to the educated layman.[2]

The inclusion of Latin generic names of plants or animals depends on the quantity of evidence found for the use of the word in an English context as the name of an individual and not as the name of a genus. Names of groups above generic level are included only in their anglicized forms, when sufficient evidence for these forms could be traced: thus dytiscid has an entry but Dytiscidae has not.

Down to the fifteenth century the language existed only in dialects, all of which had a literary standing: during this period, therefore, words and forms of all dialects are admitted on an equal footing into the Dictionary. Dialectal words and forms which occur since 1500 are not admitted, except when they continue the history of a word or sense once in general use, illustrate the history of a literary word, or have themselves a certain literary currency, as is the case with many modern Scottish words.

CLASSIFICATION OF THE VOCABULARY

For the purposes of treatment in this Dictionary, words and phrases are classed as: (1) main words, (2) subordinate words, (3) combinations, (4) derivatives. Main words comprise (1) single words, radical or derivative (e.g. an, amphitheatrically), (2) all those compound words (and phrases) which, from their meaning, history, or importance claim to be treated in separate articles (e.g. afternoon, almighty, almsman, air-pump, aitch-bone, ale-house, forget-me-not, Adam's apple, all fours), (3) important prefixes, suffixes, and combining forms which may give rise to large numbers of derivatives and compound words. The articles in which these are treated constitute the main articles. Subordinate words include variant and obsolete forms of main words, and such words of bad formation, doubtful existence, or alleged use, as it is deemed proper, on any ground, to record. The main and subordinate words are arranged in a single alphabetic series, distinguished simply by the treatment accorded them within the article; but articles dealing with spurious words are enclosed within square brackets. Combinations, when so simple as either to require no explanation, or to be capable of being briefly explained in connection with their cognates, are dealt with under the main words which form their first element, their treatment forming the concluding part of the main article. Similarly, such derivatives of a main word as do not by their frequency or complexity warrant a separate article are normally treated in an unnumbered paragraph following all the numbered sense sections of the main word, introduced by 'Hence', 'So', or 'Also'. Occasionally these will be found appended to an individual, numbered sense section and treated as part of that section for the purposes of exemplification.

MAIN WORDS

Every main word is treated, once for all, under its modern current or most usual spelling; or, if obsolete, under the most typical of its latest spellings; the form or spelling thus chosen being considered the main form of the word.

Occasionally a form or spelling of an obsolete word has been assumed, which is not actually found in the quotations adduced, but is in accordance with the usual analogies of the language, as seen in kindred words. Thus annoyously is given as the main form, on the analogy of annoy, annoyous, although only anoyously has actually been found.

Other important forms of each word, current or obsolete, are entered in their alphabetical order, as subordinate words, and are there concisely referred to the main form under which they are treated.

When a word which is historically one has different grammatical relations, it is treated as one word only, and the different relations are indicated by the division of the article into sections (marked A, B, C). This refers especially to substantives used also attributively (or adjectivally), as in 'an ounce of gold, a gold watch, gold-coloured scales'; to adjectives used substantively or pronominally, as in 'the catholic church, a good catholic; that book, that is mine, the words that he spoke'; to adjectives used adverbially, as in 'the according voice of national wisdom', 'he acted according to orders'; to adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions, originally the same word, as ABOUT, AFTER, SINCE, AS; and of course a fortiori to verbs used transitively and intransitively, as 'to abide battle, to abide at home', which, in some dictionaries, are reckoned as two distinct words.

In this Dictionary, transitive and intransitive seldom appear even as leading divisions of a verb, but, in accordance with the actual history of the word, in most cases only as varying and often temporary constructions, subordinate to the different senses, and liable to pass one into the other in the development of the language. Thus a verb at one time intransitive finally takes a simple object, through the phonetic decay of a dative or genitive ending, or the elision of a preposition, and is accounted transitive, without any change either in form or meaning (e.g. ANSWER); and a verb used transitively, likewise without change of meaning and form, at length becomes intransitive, through the regular modern English suppression of the reflexive pronoun (e.g. Ezek. 20:22 I withdrew mine hand; Mark 3:7 Jesus withdrew himself to the sea; Revised Version, Jesus withdrew to the sea). The history of ANSWER or WITHDRAW would be misrepresented by splitting them each into two words, or even by classifying their senses in a manner which would conceal these historical relations.

But verbs uniform in their stems with substantives or adjectives, as LAND, to LAND, DRY, to DRY, ABSTRACT, to ABSTRACT, are, of course, distinct words; as are adjectives and adverbs which, through 'levelling' of terminations, have become identical in form, though originally distinct, as ALIKE a., ALIKE adv.; and substantives and adjectives which have always been identical in form, but were of separate introduction into the language, and have separate histories, as ANIMAL sb., ANIMAL a. Where a word originally one has been, in the course of its history, split into two, whether with distinction of sense, as ALSO, AS, or merely as synonyms, as ANT, EMMET; APPRENTICE, PRENTICE, both modern forms are treated as separate words, and there is a reference from one article to the other. Where two original words of identical or similar form have coalesced into one, the modern word is treated as one or two, according to practical utility. When they are treated as two words, these come, of course, immediately together: see ALLAY, ALLOW, AMICE.

The treatment of a Main Word comprises:

I. The identification, II. The etymology, III. The signification, IV. The illustrative quotations.

I. The identification includes:

1. The main form, i.e. the usual or typical spelling, as already described. (In certain cases where two spellings are in current use, both are given in the main form, as ANALYSE -YZE, COLOUR COLOR, INFLECTION INFLEXION.) Words believed to be obsolete are distinguished by prefixing †; non-naturalized or partially naturalized words, by ‖.

In the case of rare words, especially those adopted or formed from Latin equivalents, it is often difficult to say whether they are or are not obsolete. They are permanent possibilities, rarely needed, but capable of being used whenever they are needed, rather than actually discarded terms. To these and other words, of which the obsoleteness is doubtful, the † is not prefixed.

As to their citizenship in the language, words may be classed as naturals, denizens, aliens, and casuals. NATURALS include all native words like father, and all fully naturalized words like street, rose, knapsack, gas, parasol. DENIZENS are words fully naturalized as to use, but not as to form, inflexion, or pronunciation, as aide-de-camp, locus, carte-de-visite, table d'hôte. ALIENS are names of foreign objects, titles, etc., which we require often to use, and for which we have no native equivalents, as shah, geyser, cicerone, targum, backsheesh, sepoy. CASUALS are foreign words of the same class, not in habitual use, which for special and temporary purposes occur in books of foreign travel, letters of foreign correspondents, and the like. There are no fixed limits between these classes, and the constant tendency is for words to pass upwards from the last to the first. But, while casuals and aliens from unfamiliar languages are readily and quickly naturalized, words from French and the learned languages, especially Latin, which are assumed to be known to all the polite, are often kept in the position of denizens for centuries: we still treat phenomenon as Greek, genus as Latin, aide-de-camp as French. The words marked with ‖ in the Dictionary comprise denizens and aliens, and such casuals as approach, or formerly approached, the position of these. Opinions will differ as to the claims of some that are included and some that are excluded, and also as to the line dividing denizens from naturals, and the position assigned to some words on either side of it. If we are to distinguish these classes at all, a line must be drawn somewhere.

2. (Within parentheses) the pronunciation or symbolization of the actual existing form of the word, as explained below. A recognized difference of pronunciation is also shown, with occasional notes on the diversity. Of obsolete words usually no pronunciation is given, but the place of the stress or accent, when ascertained, is indicated by a stress mark (') before the stressed syllable, as al'feres, 'anredly. In partially naturalized words two pronunciations are often given, viz. the native (or what passes for the native), and one conformed more or less to English analogies; in actual use many intermediate varieties may be heard, cf. rendezvous, envelope, environs, prestige, chignon, recitative, Koran, caviare, and the like.

Being the delimiters both of phonetic notation and of notes about usage and variation, the parentheses are not strictly equivalent to the pairs of oblique strokes conventionally used in technical works to mark off phonetic transcriptions.

3. The grammatical designation, i.e. the part of speech, or subdivision of the same, as pers. pron., vbl. sb. See the list of abbreviations. Words having no grammatical designation are normally substantives: the letters sb. are employed only where required to avoid ambiguity.

4. (a) In words of more or less specific use, the specification or subject label, as Mus. (in Music), Bot. (in Botany), etc.

(b) The variety of English, when the word is not current in the standard English of Great Britain, as U.S., N. Amer., Austral., etc.

(c) The status, where there is any peculiarity, as Obs. (obsolete), arch. (archaic or obsolescent), colloq. (colloquial), dial. Here also is added, when applicable, the epithet rare, with $^{-1}$, or $^{-0}$, indicating that only one, or no actual instance of the use of the word in context is known to us. Words apparently employed only for the nonce, are, when inserted in the Dictionary, marked nonce-wd.

5. (a) The principal earlier forms or spellings, with their chronological range indicated by the unit figure of the century, thus 3–6 = 13th to 16th cent.; 1 standing for all centuries down to 1100.

These figures also correspond broadly to distinct periods of the language; viz. 1 Old English or 'Anglo-Saxon'; 2 (12th c.) Old English Transition ('semi-Saxon'); 3 (13th c.) Early Middle English; 4 (14th c.) Late Middle English; 5 (15th c.) Middle English Transition; 6 (16th c.) Early Modern or Tudor English; 7 (17th c.) Middle Modern English; 8, 9, 20 (18th, 19th, and 20th c.) Recent English.

(b) The inflexions, i.e. plural of substantives, and principal parts of verbs, when other than the ordinary -s, -ed.

II. The etymology and form-history [within heavy square brackets] includes: 1. The derivation, showing the actual origin of the word, when ascertained. In some cases, this section also contains: 2. The subsequent form-history in English, when this presents special features, as phonetic change, contraction, corruption, perversion by popular etymology or erroneous association. 3. Miscellaneous facts as to the history of the word, its age, obsolescence, revival, refashioning, change of pronunciation, confusion with other words.

In the light of historical etymology, an English word is (1) the extant formal representative, or direct phonetic descendant, of an earlier word; that is to say, it is the earlier word itself, in a later or more recent form, as it has been unconsciously changed in the mouths of the successive generations that have used it. For example, ACRE (now really 'eɪkə(r)), formerly aker, is the extant form of Old English æcer, this the later form of prehistoric æcr, the special English form of acr, akr, this of West Germanic akra, this, through earlier akra-z, or Original Germanic akro-z, this of original Aryan or Indo-European agro-s; and agros, akroz, akraz, akra, akr, æcr, æcer, aker, āker, acre ('eɪkə(r)), are all merely successive and temporary forms of one and the same word, as employed during successive periods. The word has never died; no year, no day probably, has passed without its being uttered by many: but this constant use has so worn it down and modified its form, that we commonly look upon acre as a distinct word from agros, with which it is connected by many intermediate forms, of which only a few have been discriminated in writing, while the finer and more intimately connecting links have never been written. This phonetic descent is symbolized by (:—); thus ACRE:—OE. æcer.

If not the extant formal representative of an original Germanic word, an English word has been (2) adopted (a.), or (3) adapted (ad.), from some foreign language; i.e. it is a word once foreign, but now, without or with intentional change of form, used as English; or it has been (4) formed on or from (f.) native or foreign elements, or from a combination of them. Adoption is essentially a popular process, at work whenever the speakers of one language come into contact with the speakers of another, from whom they acquire foreign things, or foreign ideas, with their foreign names. It has prevailed in English at all periods from the earliest to the latest times: inch, pound, street, rose, cat, prison, algebra, antic, orange, tobacco, tea, canoe, focus, meerschaum, are adopted words. Adaptation is essentially a learned or literary process; it consists in adapting a foreign word to the 'analogies of the language', and so depriving it of its foreign termination. Examples are Latin or Greek words reduced to their stem form, or receiving recognized English endings. Latin words which lived on in Gaul there underwent regular phonetic changes, whereby they at length became 'French'; in this living French form they were adopted in Middle English; but in more recent times numerous Latin words have been taken into English directly, yet modified, in their terminations, in the same way as if they had lived on in French and been thence adopted into English.[3] Such

[3] The French words adopted before 1400 were generally taken from the Anglo-French, or French spoken for several centuries in England, where they had undergone further phonetic change. It was in strict conformity with linguistic facts that Chaucer told of his Prioresse:

> ... Frenssh she spak ful faire and fetisly,
> After the scole of Stratford atte Bowe,
> For Frenssh of Parys was to hire vnknowe:

for the Anglo-French dialect of the fourteenth century was

English words originate in an adaptation of the Latin original, not in an adoption of its French (or other Romance) extant representative. Formation consists in the combination of existing words or parts of words with each other, or with living formatives, i.e. syllables which no longer exist as separate words, but yet have an appreciable signification which they impart to the new product. Formation is the chief natural process by which the vocabulary of a language is increased. It is both popular and learned: in its popular application, it gives such words as black-bird, shep-herd, work-er, high-ness, grand-ly, a-swim, be-moan, after-noon; in learned application, such as con-caten-ation, mono-petal-ous, chloro-phyl, tele-phone; in a mixture of the two, such as acknowledge-ment, lion-ize, starv-ation, betroth-al.

Much of the terminology of modern science is identical, or as nearly so as the forms of the languages permit, in English and French, in English, French, and German, or sometimes even in most of the European languages. It would often be as difficult as useless to ascertain in which language a particular scientific term first appeared in print, this being, linguistically, a mere accident: the word was accepted as common property from the beginning. In such cases, modern formation (mod. f.) is frequently employed to intimate that it is uncertain in what modern language, English or continental, the word was first used; it may indeed have occurred first in some modern Latin work, either of English or foreign authorship. In the supplementary scientific articles added to this edition, the first use has been ascertained whenever possible and appears as the first example in the set of illustrative quotations. If a word was first coined in some other language before being adopted into English, details of the foreign coinage (when traceable) are provided in the etymology. All such foreign coinages have been verified at source since it sometimes happens that the details provided in specialized bibliographies and reference works are inaccurate. Details of the coinages of plant and animal names are provided in the normal way. When, however, the first use of a term preceded the date accepted as the starting-point for the valid nomenclature of the group involved, a reference to the first valid use is added in the etymology.

Phonetic descent (:—), adoption (a.), adaptation (ad.), word-formation (f.) are usually combined under the term derivation; but, until we know in which of them, singly or in combination, a word has originated, we do not know its etymology.

In this Dictionary, words originally native are traced to their earliest known English, and, when possible, to their earliest Germanic form, authenticated and illustrated by the cognate words in other Germanic languages and dialects; those of foreign origin are referred to the foreign word or elements whence they were immediately adopted or formed. In certain cases these foreign words, especially the French, are themselves traced to their antecedent forms or component elements; but these antecedents are considered only with a view to the clearer comprehension of the history and use of the word in English. To trace the remoter history of these words, and determine their Indo-European or other 'roots', is no part of their English history.

Of many words it has to be stated that their origin is either doubtful or altogether unknown. In such cases the historical facts are given, as far as they go, and their bearing occasionally indicated. But conjectural etymologies are rarely referred to, except to point out their agreement or disagreement with the historical facts; for these, and the full discussion which they require, the reader is referred to special treatises on etymology.

III. The signification, or senses. Some words have only one invariable signification; but most words that have been used for any length of time in a language have acquired a long and sometimes intricate series of significations, as the primitive sense has been gradually extended to include allied or associated ideas, or transferred boldly to figurative and analogical uses. This happens to a greater extent with relational words, as prepositions (cf. about, after, against, and, anent) than with notional words, as verbs and nouns; of these, also, it affects verbs and adjectives more than substantives; of substantives, it influences those which express actions, qualities, and mental conceptions (cf. account), more than those which name, and are, as it were, fixed to material objects. Yet even these latter have often acquired many different senses. Thus, board names a material object; yet compare: a thin board, a frugal board, a card-board, board and lodgings, passengers on board, to fall over board, to sit at the council board, a board school, the Board of Trade, to tread the boards, a sea-board parish.

The order in which these senses were developed is one of the most important facts in the history of the word; to discover and exhibit it are among the most difficult duties of a dictionary which aims at giving this history. If the historical record were complete, that is, if we possessed written examples of all the uses of each word from the beginning, the simple exhibition of these would display a rational or logical development. The not only from Parisian, but from all dialects of continental French. In its origin a mixture of various Norman and other Northern French dialects, afterwards mixed with and greatly modified by Angevin, Parisian, Poitevin, and other elements, and more and more exposed to the overpowering influence of literary French, it had yet received, on this side of the Channel, a distinct and independent development, following, in its phonology especially, English and not continental tendencies. As the natural speech of the higher and educated classes, it died out in the fourteenth century; but it maintained a kind of artificial existence for a longer period, and was used (in an increasingly debased form) for writing law-reports down to the seventeenth century, in which stage it still influenced the spelling of English words. Its forms survive in many of our terminations: armour, colour, glorious, gracious, envious, perilous, arrival, espousal, language, enjoy, benefit, gaoler, caitif, are the actual Anglo-French forms, as distinct from those of continental Old and Modern French. As a rule, it may be assumed that the original form of every Middle English word of French origin was identical with the Anglo-French form; and that, where a gap appears between the earliest known English form of a word and its Old French equivalent, that gap would be filled up by the recovery of the Anglo-French and earliest English form. It was not until the fifteenth century, and chiefly at the hands of Caxton, that continental French forms and spellings began directly to influence our language.

historical record is not complete enough to do this, but it is usually sufficient to enable us to infer the actual order. In exhibiting this in the Dictionary, that sense is placed first which was actually the earliest in the language: the others follow in the order in which they appear to have arisen. As, however, the development often proceeded in many branching lines, sometimes parallel, often divergent, it is evident that it cannot be adequately represented in a single linear series. Hence, while the senses are numbered straight on 1, 2, 3, etc., they are also grouped under branches marked I, II, III, etc., in each of which the historical order begins afresh. Subdivisions of the senses, varieties of construction, etc., are marked a, b, c, etc.; subdivisions of these, used especially for sense-divisions under combinations and derivatives, (a), (b), (c), or (i), (ii), (iii), etc.

So far for words of which the senses have been developed in English itself. But in adopted or adapted words which had already acquired various significations in the language (e.g. Latin) from which they were taken, it often happens that the order in which the senses appeared in English does not agree with the natural order in which they were developed in the original language. The English order is in fact accidental. For it was not in the primary sense that the word was first taken into English, but in a figurative, transferred, or specialized use, as an ecclesiastical, legal, grammatical, or medical term, which perhaps took root in our language, and here received a development of its own. Subsequently, however, familiarity with the Latin language and literature sometimes led to a fresh adoption of the word in the primary sense, or to a sudden extension of English usage, so as to include the primary sense, which thus appears as of quite late origin in English. In such a case it is not possible to make the historical order of the senses in English agree with the logical order in which they arose in Latin or other previous language; and every such word must be treated in the way which seems best suited to exhibit the facts of its own history and use. Instances of such words are afforded by ADVENT, AGONY, ANNUNCIATION, APPEND.

Obsolete senses, like obsolete words, have † prefixed, so as to be at once distinguished from those now in use. Under ¶ are included catachrestic and erroneous uses, confusions, and the like.

To a great extent the explanations of the meanings, or definitions, have been framed anew upon a study of all the quotations for each word collected for this work, of which those printed form only a small part. But the labours of other scholars in this, the most successfully cultivated department of English lexicography, have not been neglected. In particular, the explanations of Dr Johnson and of his editor Archdeacon Todd have often been adopted unchanged (within inverted commas and marked J. or T.), as have those of N. Bailey, and other early lexicographers, to whom it is only right to give credit for original work which has become the common property of all their successors.

IV. The quotations illustrate the forms and uses of the word, showing the age of the word generally, and of its various senses particularly; the earliest and, in obsolete words or senses, the latest, known instances of its occurrence being always quoted. Except in special cases, where the letters of the Greek alphabet, α, β, γ, etc. are used to separate parallel forms, the illustration of the forms is subordinated to that of the senses: the quotations illustrating each sense immediately follow the explanation. They are arranged chronologically so as to give about one for each century, though various considerations often render a larger number necessary. The original spelling is retained, as an essential part of the history of the language. But merely graphical or typographical devices, such as contractions, erratic presence of capitals, and (in seventeenth-century books) employment of italics to emphasize words, phrases, or whole passages, are not reproduced; and simple blunders, which would mislead the reader, are tacitly corrected. The recent use of italics, to indicate a doubt about the status of a word, is retained as being often of historical importance.

As to letter, the Old and Middle English 'thorn' (þ = th) and Old English 'divided d' or 'edh' (ð; usually only a variant of 'þ', though sometimes distinguished) are retained; also ME. 'open-tailed g', or 'yogh' (ȝ = y initially, gh finally). In Old English, the letter g had the form 'ɡ, ɠ' (a peculiar British development of the Roman G). Besides the original sound in *g*o, *g*ild, this letter had also (at least in later Old English) a fricative sound as in Dutch dag, or Irish lou*gh*, (or both), and a palatalized sound, approximately = y in *y*e, *y*es. After the Norman Conquest the modern forms 'g, g', were introduced (from French) for the sound in *g*o, and the new sound in *g*inger; but the OE. form (in process of time slightly modified) was retained for the sounds in lou*gh*, *y*es, till the introduction of printing. In printing Old English modern scholars sometimes reproduce the contemporary 'ɡ, ɠ' (as is done by Sievers, in his Angelsachsische Grammatik), but more commonly substitute modern 'g, g'. The adoption of either course exclusively in this work would have broken the historical continuity of the forms; in the one case, we should have had the same word appearing in the eleventh century as '*ɡ*old', and in the twelfth century as 'gold'; in the other, the same word written in the eleventh century 'ge' and in twelfth century '*ȝ*e'. To avoid this, both forms are here used in Old English, in accordance with the Middle English distinction in their use; thus, 'gold', '*ɡ*e', 'dæ*ɡ*'. The reader will understand that 'g' and 'ɡ' represent the same Old English letter, and that the distinction made between them is purely editorial (though certainly corresponding to a distinction of sound in OE.). For ME. the form 'ȝ' commonly used in reprints is employed, so that OE. '*ɡ*e' becomes ME. '*ȝ*e', modern 'ye'; OE. '*ɡ*eno*ɡ*, *ɡ*enoh', ME. 'yno*ȝ*, inou*ȝ*', mod. 'enough'.

It is to be distinctly borne in mind that the quotations are not merely examples of the fully developed use of the word or special sense under which they are cited: they have also to illustrate its origin, its gradual separation from allied words or senses, or even, by negative evidence, its non-existence at the given date. It would often have been desirable to annotate the quotations, explaining the purpose for which they are adduced; but the exigencies of space render this impossible, and they are therefore left to speak for themselves. Some help has been offered by enclosing within [. . .] quotations given for what may be called subsidiary purposes.

The need to keep the Dictionary within practicable limits has also rendered it necessary to give only a minimum of quotations selected from the material available, and to make those given as brief as possible. It is to be observed that in their abridged form they simply illustrate the word, phrase, or construction, for which they are given, and do not necessarily express the sentiments of their authors, though in no case have they been intentionally curtailed in such a way as to misrepresent their original meaning. This, however, may always be ascertained, and the full context recovered, by help of the exact reference to author, work, and passage, which it is a special feature of this work to give. Here also the utmost conciseness has been indispensable; the exact date renders the surnames only of authors in many cases sufficient; the titles of books are so abbreviated as to be recognizable by those who know them, or to be adequate for the purpose of reference to a library or bibliographical catalogue. The reader is referred to the List of Abbreviations (p. lxvi) for the expansion of those most commonly used in citing book titles; details of many of the works cited may be found in the Select Bibliography at the end of the Dictionary.

In order to allow consistent reference to cited works, an approximately uniform value has been given to different forms of numerals. Thus, in all works, roman capitals (IV.) stand for volume; small capitals (iv.) for book, part, or other larger division; lower-case letters (iv.) for chapter or its equivalent; and arabic numerals (42/1) for page and, where relevant, column: Other divisions, as marginal section—the most useful of references, since it is not dependent on the paging of a particular edition—are indicated by special marks. In the Essayists of the eighteenth century (Spectator, etc.), of which the editions are innumerable, the reference is to the paragraphs of each essay or number, counted for this purpose. In poetry, the reference iv. iv. 42 means act, scene, line; or canto, stanza, line, (rarely book, canto, stanza), as the work may be divided. In Shakespeare (where the reading is that of the First Folio, 1623) the lines of the Globe edition are referred to. In dramatic works, or other long poems, of which the lines are not numbered, the arabic numerals mean the page of the edition quoted. Single poems are, whenever possible, cited by name and line; in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, every edition of which has its own order and numbering, the only useful mode of reference was to number the lines of each piece, tale, or prologue, separately. As neither manuscripts nor editions agree as to the junction of the Canon's Yeoman's Prologue and Tale, the two have been reckoned as one piece. Melibeus and the Parson's Tale are referred to by the versicles as divided in the Six-text edition, but numbered separately. In many works, both prose and verse, the only available reference has been to the volume and page of a specified edition, which is thus indicated, 'Wks. 1802, III. 178'.

Whenever practicable, a work is dated and quoted from its first edition: if the reference is to a later edition (as has been often unavoidable), the date of this is added (within parentheses) to the reference.[4] It is necessary to be precise on this point, for later editions often change the spelling: hence, a quotation from them is valid for the use of the word, but not for its spelling, at the date assigned. In the first edition of this Dictionary, reasonable accuracy was attained in dates and references: in the former, absolute accuracy was in many cases impossible, and, for the purposes of this work, was not considered essential; in the latter, errors were inevitable in the work of so many years and so many readers.

The policy governing the supplementary quotations added to this edition is more rigorous with regard to the dating and verification of quotations; the bibliographical conventions stated here may stand for the ideal principles of the Dictionary as a whole. Quotations are normally taken from the earliest available printing of a work; where a later text has been used its date is given in parentheses after the title. Intentional exceptions can be found in often-quoted works whose first editions are rare; fuller details are shown in the Bibliography. Unverified quotations from secondary sources have an attribution in parentheses after the citation (e.g. Morris, Pettman, etc.).

The bold-face date is the date of first printing except for posthumous works. It is sometimes qualified by c (circa) or a (ante = before, not later than). The date of delivery of a lecture or production of a play is not normally accepted: the spoken word is dated by its first appearance in print. The date of composition is accepted, however, for dated letters, journals, and the like (of those which have not been written up for publication), but only exceptionally in other cases and only when there is good evidence for the date. Items in collections (e.g. of short stories) which were published earlier elsewhere are given this earlier date when it is known. It should be noted that these criteria are more severe and produce more conservative datings than those of many other reference works.

Author and title. This part of the citation is used first to identify the user of the quoted word, and secondly to identify the work from which a quotation is taken. Usually there is no conflict, but where there is the identification of the work takes precedence. Monographs are cited either by author and title or by title alone. Corporate authorship is not recognized: the names of institutions, business firms, etc., are not used in place of a personal name, but are added in parentheses at the end of titles. Periodicals and serials are cited by title (usually in abbreviated form); the authors of articles in periodicals are not usually named unless the quotation contains the first use of a word. The information given should be enough to identify the work, but occasionally it is not possible to give an unambiguous indication in the space available; in these cases the Bibliography gives a fuller account.

Form of name. Some frequently quoted authors are cited by surname alone; for most others the title-page of each work is the main authority, with deviations to allow for the standardization of initials where an author's own practice varies or for the purpose of avoiding ambiguity. Pseudonyms are indicated by single quotation marks (except that a few well-known pseudonyms like Geo. Eliot stand without the quotation marks), and authors who have changed their names are cited by the appropriate name for each work. Anonymous works are cited by title, but by author where the authorship has been established and is recognized in common practice. Small capitals usually denote the author of the quotation. The name of an editor of a work, who is not also the author of the actual quotation given, is normally printed in lower case. But quotations from many composite works have been attributed to the editors alone. Illustrative examples embodying typical recent usage of a word or sense, but not attributable to any exterior source, are introduced by the abbreviation 'Mod.', preceded, where necessary, by a date, which is that of the fascicle of the first edition in which they were first printed.

[4] In the case of some well-known and often-quoted works, where the reference is always to a standard edition or modern literal reprint, it was not thought necessary by the first edition's editors to insert the date of it. Owing to the continual growth of literary and historical scholarship during and after their time, many of these are now no longer the most recent standard edition.

SUBORDINATE WORDS

Under this head are here included: 1. (and mainly) Obsolete and variant forms of words, when these are so far removed in spelling as not to come closely before or after the regular forms, or readily to suggest them. These words are concisely referred to the main form to which they belong, with an explanatory synonym when the latter is itself obsolete; as almacantar, -urie, obs. ff. (= obsolete forms of) ALMUCANTAR; abugge, obs. w. and s.w.f. (= obsolete western and south-western form of) ABYE v.; almoise, -moyse, var. (= variant of) ALMOSE, Obs., alms. To economize space, variant forms which differ from the regular form only in the doubling of a single consonant or the converse, as appert for APERT, aple for APPLE, or in the interchange of u, v or i, j, are not usually inserted. 2. Irregular or peculiar inflexions of Main Words. 3. Spurious or erroneous forms found in Dictionaries, or cited from single passages in authors, but having little or no claim to recognition as genuine constituents of the English vocabulary: their character is pointed, and their history briefly given. Entries for spurious words are enclosed in square brackets.

COMBINATIONS

Under this term are included all collocations of simple words in which the separate spelling of each word is retained, whether they are formally connected by the hyphen, or virtually by the unity of their signification. The formal union and the actual by no means coincide: not only is the use of the hyphen a matter of indifference in an immense number of cases, but in many where it is habitually used, the combination implies no unity of signification; while others, in which there is a distinct unity or specialization of meaning, are not hyphenated. The primary use of the hyphen is grammatical: it implies either that the syntactic relation between two words is closer than if they stood side by side without it, or that the relation is a less usual one than that which would at first sight suggest itself to us, if we saw the two words standing unconnected. Thus, in the three sentences, 'After consideration had been given to the proposal, it was duly accepted', 'After consideration the proposal was accepted', 'After-consideration had shown him his mistake', we have first no immediate syntactic relation between after (conjunctive adverb) and consideration; secondly, the relation of preposition and object; thirdly, the relation of attribute and substantive, closer than the first, less usual than the second (since after is more commonly a preposition than an adjective). But after-consideration is not really a single word, any more than subsequent consideration, fuller consideration; the hyphen being merely a convenient help to the sense, which would be clearly expressed in speech by the different phrase-accentuation of ˌ*after conside*'ration and '*after conside*ˌ*ration*. And as this 'help to the sense' is not always equally necessary, nor its need equally appreciated in the same place, it is impossible that its use should be uniform. Nevertheless after-consideration, as used above, is on the way to becoming a single word, which reconsideration (chiefly because re- is not a separate word, but also because we have reconsider) is reckoned to be; and indeed close grammatical relation constantly accompanies close union of sense, so that in many combinations the hyphen becomes an expression of this unification of sense. When this unification and specialization has proceeded so far that we no longer analyse the combination into its elements, but take it in as a whole, as in blackberry, postman, newspaper, pronouncing it in speech with a single accent, the hyphen is usually omitted, and the fully developed compound is written as a single word. But as this also is a question of degree, there are necessarily many compounds as to which usage has not yet determined whether they are to be written with the hyphen or as single words. Many specialized combinations, indeed, are often not even hyphenated: especially is this the case with descriptive names, formed of a substantive preceded by an adjective or possessive case, or followed by a phrase, as Aaron's rod, all fours, Black Jack, Jack of all trades, Jew's harp, sea anemone.

There is thus considerable difficulty in determining to what extent combinations are matters for the lexicographer, and to what extent they are merely grammatical. While no attempt is made fully to solve this difficulty, combinations formal and virtual are, for practical purposes, divided into three classes: First: those in which each word retains its full meaning, the relation between them falling under one or other of the ordinary grammatical categories. Of these, specimens merely are given, at the end of each article, which are printed in heavy italics, and illustrated collectively by a few quotations. Second: Combinations of which the signification is somewhat specialized, but still capable of being briefly explained in a few words, in connection with their cognates. These also are concisely treated at the end of the main article, where they are printed in small, dark bold type in an alphabetical series, and illustrated by quotations arranged in the same order. When these are very numerous the first usage of the word illustrated is typically distinguished in the quotation by prefixing *, in order that it may catch the eye more readily. Third: Combinations which attain in specialization of sense to the position of full compounds or which are used in various senses, or have a long history, and thus require to be dealt with more at large. These are often enumerated (in SMALL CAPITALS) at the end of the main article, and thence referred to their alphabetical place, where they are treated in all respects as main words.

All compounds and combinations of interest or importance will thus be found either in their alphabetical order, or under the word which constitutes their first element. But phrases are treated under their leading word, as on account of, under ACCOUNT; and specific names, like sea anemone, black alder, under their generic names ANEMONE, ALDER, etc. Sea anemone is considered (linguistically) as a kind of anemone, but Adam's needle not as a kind of needle, nor mouse-ear as a kind of ear.

DERIVATIVES

This term is used for any word which has been formed by the addition of a suffix to a main word also treated in this Dictionary (also, more rarely, by the alteration or removal of the suffix of a main word). Derivatives may be regarded as occupying a half-way position between, on the one hand, combinations (arising out of syntactical relationships between words determined chiefly by their semantic reference) and, on the other, inflected forms (whose existence and form, with the exception in English of a limited set of irregular inflexions, are predetermined by the system of grammar). In other words, a very considerable number of the derivatives recorded are predictable and transparent: as, for example, the many adverbs formed by the addition of -ly from adjectives, the similarly derived abstract nouns in -ness, and the agent-nouns in -er, most of which are thrown up by syntactic transformations. So 'he is insufficiently motivated', 'a fashioner of sonnets', 'the coolness of our reception' are closely linked with 'his motivation is insufficient', 'to fashion sonnets', 'we had a cool reception'. On the very borderline with the inflexional system lie the verbal substantives and participial adjectives, ending in -ing and -ed, which are indistinguishable in form, and often in function also, from the corresponding gerunds and participles. At the other end of the scale there are small groups of derivatives incorporating uncommon suffixes, which have emerged or have been coined in much the same way as combinations (with which, indeed, they may be interchangeable). At the extreme, we find slang and journalistic formations such as those ending in -ville (Squaresville) or -aholic (workaholic), which resemble combinations in their raison d'être.

The necessity for the separate treatment of those derivatives which are actually homomorphic with regular inflected forms, such as the verbal substantives and participial adjectives, or whose incidence is so regular and natural as to amount almost to the status of inflexion, such as the adverbs formed with -ly or agent-nouns in -er, might almost be denied, on the grounds that the senses of the derivative are deducible from those of the parent word. But in fact the occurrence of even the obviously formed derivatives, and the relationships of their senses with the root words, is very often unpredictable and complex; and the suffixes by which they are formed cannot be tidily separated into two groups, according to whether their application is transparent and regular or not. It is, therefore, the practice of the Dictionary to register every recorded derivative, and to accord it such treatment as its own meaning and use necessitate. The majority of derivatives entered in the Dictionary will be found as main words in their own right, but linked through the cross-references employed in their etymologies, and frequently also in their definitions, to the main words on which they are formed.

Derivatives which are of infrequent occurrence, or which have only one sense, or only a few senses straightforwardly related to those of the root word, are usually treated in a separate paragraph at the end of the article for the parent word. They are printed in the same small, dark bold type as combinations, and are usually introduced by 'Hence' (signifying formation on, and chronological succession to, the root word), 'So' (implying derivation but not posteriority), or 'Also' (occasionally used to connect parallel derivatives when no parent word has been traced). This arrangement has the great merit that whatever information about the pronunciation, variations in form, and etymology is common to the derivative and its parent word need not be repeated. Further conciseness is sometimes achieved by the appending of derivatives at the end of the definition of the root word in an article that has only one sense-division. From time to time, a derivative that has arisen in only one sense of a complex main word is treated under that sense-division.

ORDERING OF ENTRIES

Entries are arranged in the Dictionary in the alphabetical order of their headwords. Alphabetization is based strictly upon the twenty-six letters of the standard English alphabet. An initial capital letter is treated as in no way distinct from a small one. The spacing within a headword consisting of two or more written words is disregarded. Hence, for example, the sequence of headwords all-rounder, All Saints, allseed, All Souls, allspice.

In a similar way, all characters and symbols that are not among the twenty-six letters are either disregarded, or treated like the alphabetical letters or combinations to which they are most nearly equivalent. Apostrophes, full points, hyphens, and spaces occurring anywhere within the headword are disregarded: hence, for the sake of ordering, p'an is equivalent to pan, met. to met, and co-op to coop. Diacritical accents are also ignored: so cañon is equivalent to canon, korin to kōrin. The ligatures æ and œ, naturally enough, are alphabetized as if written ae, oe; ø as simple o; 'thorn' (þ) and 'edh' (ð) are treated as equivalent to th; and 'yogh' (ȝ) as equivalent to gh.

Pairs of parentheses, enclosing optional letters, are ignored. A single opening parenthesis, marking off the last letter or letters of a word, functions in a way that is counter to the general rule: the letters following the opening parenthesis are disregarded for the purpose of ordering. So anachoret(e precedes anachoretal. The most typical function of this convention is to mark off a final silent -e that has little historical significance.

Headwords with the same spelling (homographs), including those rendered equivalent by the conventions just described, are normally ordered according to grammatical category. Prefixes and suffixes are labelled as such and treated as separate grammatical categories. Combining forms, though lacking a special label, are similarly treated. Variant and obsolete forms (subordinate words), and written or spoken abbreviations entered as main words, have likewise no special label, but are commonly treated as members of separate grammatical categories.

There is no absolutely fixed order in which grammatical categories are arranged. All other things being equal, the major grammatical categories of noun (substantive in the Dictionary's terminology), adjective, verb, and adverb, precede, in that order, the minor ones; but the ordering very frequently departs from this general principle, especially where a group of etymologically related homographs is arranged in an order that reflects the historical development.

Identically spelt headwords that also belong to the same grammatical category are distinguished by following superior numbers ('homonym numbers') and are usually arranged in the order of their earliest occurrence. Entries that are not explicitly labelled with a part of speech, but are treated as distinct grammatical categories (such as variant forms and abbreviations), are distinguished by superior numbering from others of the same kind, and not necessarily from unlabelled entries of other kinds.

ORDERING OF SENSES

Eight kinds of serial symbol are employed to mark the sense-divisions of an entry, and less commonly, to classify the written variants of the headword, and each is, generally speaking, identified with particular functions. At the highest level, bold capital letters (A, B, C, etc.) divide into sections an entry treating a word that is used in more than one grammatical relation. The main senses of a word are identified by bold arabic numerals (1, 2, 3). Important subdivisions of these, reflecting either semantic, grammatical, or phraseological extensions of the sense, are identified by bold small letters (a, b, c). Italic letters within parentheses (a), (b), (c), are employed either to subdivide the last level of sense-distinction still more finely, or to categorize the senses of combinations, derivatives, and phrases. Very occasionally it is necessary to subdivide a definition introduced by an italic letter, and then lower-case roman numerals in parentheses (i), (ii), (iii), are introduced.

The main sense-divisions, and any subdivisions they may have, proceed in a single sequence within the entry, or one grammatical section of it; so the appearance of B will start a new sequence 1, 2, 3 or a, b, c. But senses which have developed along several different and parallel branches are arranged into groups headed by bold capital roman numerals (I, II, III) and these do not interrupt the numerical sequence of the main sense-divisions. If a lower level of branching needs to be recognized (in the arrangement of a particularly large and complicated word, for example), an increasing series of asterisks (*, , ) is used. These sometimes also occur as a means of grouping the uses of phrasal verbs.

Greek letters (α, β, γ) are used primarily to classify variant forms at the head of an entry. Sometimes the illustrative quotations are grouped according to the variant forms they illustrate, and in this case each group of quotations is introduced by the corresponding Greek letter. Certain words with an exceptionally complicated form-history are divided into sections, of which the first, headed A, illustrates the forms. This section has the usual framework, but with the numeral and lower-case roman letter sequences indicating the major and minor grammatical divisions and the Greek letters indicating the main form-variations within each of them. If the word also has more than one grammatical relation, the signification (headed B) is divided into sections, headed (the capital letter series having already been appropriated) by bold capital roman numerals, each containing separate series of main senses introduced by arabic numerals.

PRONUNCIATION

The pronunciation is the actual living form or forms of a word, that is, the word itself, of which the current spelling is only a symbolization—generally, indeed, only the traditionally-preserved symbolization of an earlier form, sometimes imperfect to begin with, still oftener corrupted in its passage to our time. This living form is the latest fact in the form-history of the word, the starting-point of all investigations into its previous history, the only fact in its form-history to which the lexicographer can personally witness. For all his statements as to its previous history are only reproductions of the evidence of former witnesses, or deductions drawn from earlier modes of symbolizing the forms of the word then current, checked and regulated by the ascertained laws and principles of phonology. To register the current pronunciation is therefore essential, in a dictionary which deals with the language on historical principles. It would be manifestly absurd, for example, to trace the form-history of the first numeral from the Old Germanic ain, through the Old English án, to the Middle English oan, on, oon, one, and to stop short at the last of these, without recognizing the modern English (wʌn), which represents a greater change within the last three and a half centuries than had previously taken place in 1500 years. The fact that the written history, as embodied in the spelling, accidentally stops short at the Middle English one, makes it all the more necessary to give the modern history and current form of the living word, since of these no hint is otherwise conveyed.

The system of transcription employed in this edition is the International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA). It follows, in the main, the principles for transcribing English pronunciation used in other Oxford Dictionaries. The minor differences in style have been adopted in order to accommodate the phonetic representation of unassimilated foreign words, dialect and regional forms, and the reconstructed pronunciation of earlier English.

A list of the symbols employed in the transcription is provided in the Key to the Pronunciation (below, p. lxv). The following features deserve special notice:

Consonants. The breathed (voiceless) pronunciation of the combination wh, used by many speakers of English, is represented by (hw). The possibility that 'linking r' may occur at the end of a word in which a final r is written, when the following word begins with a vowel-sound, is symbolized by ((r)), e.g. her (hɜː(r)). Parentheses around other consonants, for example (j) in words like suit, (p) in words like impromptu, or (t) in words like bench, indicate that the enclosed sounds may or may not be heard in the context. A hyphen is used between (t) and (ʃ) belonging to separate word elements

(e.g. in courtship) in contradistinction to the affricative group (tʃ) that is usually written ch. Double consonants are shown by the doubling of the symbol.

Vowels and Diphthongs. The symbolization of the vowels of the principal foreign languages cited generally corresponds to the system of so-called 'cardinal vowels'. English 'short e' (as in bet) is treated as approximately equivalent to cardinal no. 3, and therefore symbolized by (ɛ). Following the first edition, the long open vowel (ɔː) (as in border) is distinguished from the centring diphthong (ɔə) (as in boarder) which is of a different origin but has become identical with it in most varieties of southern British pronunciation. Length (symbolized by (ː)) is shown in English words, in accordance with general present-day custom, even though most 'long' and 'short' vowels are identified and distinguished more by their place of articulation than by their duration, which varies in accordance with context. The distinction observed in this Dictionary between the 'long' close vowels (iː) and (uː) and the 'short' open vowels (ɪ) and (ʊ) in syllables with low stress should be understood in the light of this. Length is marked in words from foreign languages in which this is conventional. It is occasionally marked in French words (in which it is not strictly necessary) when these are felt to have become somewhat Anglicized. Nasalization is shown by the tilde (˜). Parenthesized 'schwa' (ə) preceding the consonants (l), (m), or (n) indicates that these are, or may be pronounced as, syllabic consonants. Parentheses around any other vowel symbol indicate that it may or may not be heard in that context.

Alternative pronunciations. Alternative pronunciations for a word are listed, set off by commas, and where necessary labelled. Parallels (||) indicate the non-naturalized pronunciation of the word. Older pronunciations are sometimes distinguished by 'formerly'; but no exhaustive analysis of the currency, frequency, or distribution of alternative pronunciations is implied by their ordering. An alternative pronunciation may be indicated simply by a transcription of that part of the word which is phonetically different, indicated by leading or following hyphens. The existence of a variant pronunciation with (æ) in many words which contain a (pronounced ɑː) is indicated by adding -æ- (or æ-) after the main transcription. The (now fairly rare) variant pronunciation of o (usually ɒ) as (ɔː) is indicated by a parallel convention.

Stress. The main stress is shown by a superior stress mark (ˈ) preceding the stressed syllable. Secondary stress is shown by an inferior stress mark (ˌ). Syllables can begin with a vowel, a single consonant, or as large a consonant group as would be articulable at the beginning of a word, but in certain words speakers actually make a syllable-division at a later point. Where stress is marked in ordinary graphic forms, the same general principles are observed, with certain allowances for English spelling. Any consonant combinations that make up only a single sound are treated as unbreakable (so o'ccur, para'psychic but ac'cede, resig'nation); single letters symbolizing consonant combinations are perforce unbreakable (so e'xistence). Sometimes the function of the stress-mark is to show that a word is a disyllable rather than the monosyllable it might otherwise appear to be, e.g. higher ('haɪə(r)) but hire (haɪə(r)); 'creat but treat.

THE HISTORY OF THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY

THE FIRST EDITION 1857–1928[1]

If there is any truth in the old Greek maxim that a large book is a great evil, English dictionaries have been steadily growing worse ever since their inception nearly four centuries ago. To set Cawdrey's slim small volume of 1604 beside the completed Oxford English Dictionary is like placing the original acorn beside the oak that has grown out of it.

The immensity of this growth is explained by the successive introduction of three new principles in lexicography. The earlier dictionary-makers followed in the line of the old glossaries, and directed their attention to such words as were likely to be unfamiliar to the ordinary person. The widening of this narrow range during the seventeenth century is made obvious by the steady increase in size through Bullokar, Cockeram, Blount, and Phillips, until in the eighteenth the principle of general inclusion was practically accepted by Kersey and Bailey. The next stage is marked by Johnson's systematic use of quotations to illustrate and justify the definitions, the many omissions still existing in the vocabulary being partly filled by later supplementary works on the same lines. When to all this was superadded the principle of historical illustration, introduced by Richardson, it became inevitable that any adequate dictionary of English must be one of the larger books of the world.

It is remarkable that Richardson's dictionary, perhaps through certain defects in his method, did not at once attract the attention it deserved. From the appearance of the first instalment in the Encyclopaedia Metropolitana in 1819 to the full acceptance of the historical principle by the Philological Society almost forty years had passed, and the separate publication of his dictionary in 1836–7 did not affect to any appreciable extent the work of those lexicographers who followed in the wake of Johnson or Webster. Even his wealth of quotations remained unutilized, although they formed a natural storehouse for any who cared to search in it and bring forth 'treasures new and old' to add to those already available in the works of Johnson and his successors.

That a forward step was made towards the end of these forty years was due to the action taken by the Philological Society in the summer of 1857, apparently as the result of a suggestion made by F. J. Furnivall to Dean Trench in May. At the meeting held on 18 June 'the appointment of Messrs. Herbert Coleridge and Furnivall and Dean Trench by the Council, as a committee to collect unregistered words in English, was announced, and that they would report to the next Meeting of the Society in November'. At this stage the idea was to prepare and publish a volume supplementary to the later editions of Johnson, or to Richardson, and containing all words omitted in either of these dictionaries.

The committee did not report in November, but on the fifth of that month one of its members, Dean Trench, read the first part of a paper 'On some Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries', while the report was postponed till 3 December. This interval allowed the second part of the paper to be read on 19 November, when the Society showed its appreciation by resolving 'That The Dean of Westminster be requested to publish his interesting and valuable Paper. To this request he kindly acceded.' Publication followed almost immediately, the first edition bearing the date 1857 and the title 'On some Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries, being the substance of two papers read before the Philological Society, Nov. 5 and Nov. 19, 1857. By Richard Chenevix Trench, D.D., Dean of Westminster.'

Even at this day, after the lapse of a hundred and fifty years and the advance in English studies which has taken place during that time, Dean Trench's paper retains its value as a statement of what an English dictionary ought to be. No one who reads it can fail to see how clearly he anticipated the lines on which the Society's dictionary was ultimately compiled—all of them, indeed, a necessary result from the historical principle which he laid down as the only sound basis for the work.

At the meeting of 3 December 1857, a report from the 'Unregistered Words Committee was read by the Secretary to that Committee, Mr. H. Coleridge'. This was followed by the resolution 'That for the present this Report be received and laid on the table. This resolution was passed in consequence of a statement that a larger scheme, for a completely new English Dictionary, might shortly be submitted to the Society.' The Dean's paper had clearly convinced the Society of the inadequacy of its proposals, and had shown that nothing short of a 'completely new' work would suffice. In this natural way arose the epithet New which appeared on the title-page of the Dictionary when the time for publication arrived.

The Society lost no time in following up the new idea, little suspecting the magnitude of the task which lay before it, and the many years that would elapse before it would be completed, or even properly begun. On 7 January 1858, 'the following resolutions were passed relating to the undertaking of a New English Dictionary.

I. That instead of the Supplement to the Standard English Dictionaries now in course of preparation by the order of the Society, a New Dictionary of the English Language be prepared under the Authority of the Philological Society.

[1] This account is reproduced, with only minor modifications, from the 'Historical Introduction' to the OED published in 1933.

II. That the work be placed in the hands of two Committees, the one, Literary and Historical, consisting of The very Rev. The Dean of Westminster, F. J. Furnivall, Esq., and Herbert Coleridge, Esq. (Secretary), the other, Etymological, consisting of Hensleigh Wedgwood, Esq., and Prof. Malden, and that in questions of doubt as to the form which any article shall assume, the decision of the Literary and Historical Committee shall be final.

III. That the Society desires to express its thanks to the contributors who have kindly given their assistance to its Unregistered Words Committee, and to invite their assistance, and that of fresh volunteers, in the new undertaking.

IV. That Messrs. Furnivall and Coleridge be empowered to enter into such conditional agreement with Messrs. Nutt of London and Asher of Berlin, or such other Publishers as they think fit, to publish the Dictionary on such terms as they think fit.

V. That the Subscriptions of all Members who have joined or shall join the Society through the Unregistered Words Committee or the New Dictionary Committee, shall be placed, so far as required, at the disposal of the Committees now appointed, to defray their printing and other expenses.

VI. That the Philological Society will afford every assistance in its power to enable its Committees to make a Dictionary worthy of the English Language.'

As is indicated in the third of these resolutions, the Unregistered Words Committee had been remarkably successful, during its brief existence, in arousing interest in the Society's undertaking, and in enlisting willing helpers to aid in carrying it out. Towards the close of his paper as printed, Dean Trench had been able to make an encouraging statement on this head. 'Let me mention here that seventy-six volunteers have already come forward, claiming their shares in the task. A hundred and twenty-one works of English authors, in most cases the whole works of each author, have been taken in hand by them; and I may add that thirty-one contributions have already been sent in.' In this way began the system of voluntary readers, without whose help the material for the Society's dictionary could never have been collected at all, except at a prohibitive cost of time and money.

At the meeting on 21 January 1858, 'Mr. Furnivall read a circular which the New Dictionary Committee proposed to issue, stating the plan of the Dictionary and asking for help in carrying it out'. It does not appear whether the circular was actually issued, and further notices in the Transactions for that year are brief and unimportant. A glimpse of the progress that was being made is afforded by a passage in Coleridge's letter to Dean Trench (30 May 1860), which was printed in the second edition of the Dean's paper. 'More than a year passed away in combating various difficulties, and it was not till August 1858, that we felt ourselves in a position to announce the plan of a New Dictionary as a certainty, and to invite contributors to furnish us with assistance.' Negotiations with publishers had been carried on during the year, first with John Murray, and then with David Nutt; finally on 4 November, Furnivall 'stated that Messrs. Trübner & Co. had agreed to publish the Society's New English Dictionary'. The young co-workers, for both Furnivall and Coleridge were still in early manhood, had not only all the optimism of youth, but were embarking on an uncharted sea, quite unwitting of the long course which had to be sailed before the farther shore could even come into sight.

By 1859 the Committee was able to publish full details of the undertaking in the form of a 'Proposal for the Publication of a New English Dictionary by the Philological Society'. This document is a proof of the thoroughness and sound judgement with which the whole question had been considered. Opening with a review of the steps by which the idea of a 'new' dictionary had been reached, the authors of the Proposal went on to lay down certain principles as a basis for the work, of which the two most important are the first and fourth, viz.

I. The first requirement of every lexicon is that it should contain every word occurring in the literature of the language it professes to illustrate.

IV. In the treatment of individual words the historical principle will be uniformly adopted.

Other contents of the Proposal are 'Rules and Directions for Collectors' as agreed upon by the Literary, Historical, and Etymological Committees, and 'Mechanical and Practical Regulations'. These are 1. 'A list of the printed literature of England belonging to the period 1250–1526', with the added note, 'Those works marked with an asterisk are already undertaken'. 2. 'A list of works of the Second Period (1526–1674) already undertaken'. 3. A similar list of 'works of the Third Period (1674–1858) already undertaken'. This division of the literature into three periods, which originated with Coleridge and was maintained for some time as a basis of collecting, has a real foundation in fact. Although the dates 1526 and 1674 were chosen because the former was that of the first printed English New Testament, and the latter the year of Milton's death, they correspond very closely with significant epochs in the development of the English vocabulary. If arrived at by accident, they at the same time show a sound instinct for detecting the periods of essential change.

The volunteers were also beginning to play their part, and to provide the Committee with material to work upon. 'In April 1859 a paper containing queries respecting etymologies and several difficult passages from Early English books was circulated among members of the Society and contributors to the Dictionary, and conjectures in answer were invited ... So much of the results of this appeal as the Dictionary Committee consider sufficiently valuable, and sufficiently certain to be worth printing' was reported to the Society by Coleridge in a paper entitled 'Hints towards the explanation of some hard words and passages in English writers'. On 10 November of the same year, Coleridge, now formally appointed as editor, presented a 'report on the Society's proposed Dictionary'.

The following month saw another forward step, when on 8 December the Society resolved:

I. That a Committee be appointed to draw up a set of Rules for the guidance of the Editor of the Society's new English Dictionary.

II. That the Committee consist of:

The Very Rev. The Dean of Westminster	Thomas Watts, Esq.
Professor Key.	F. Pulszky, Esq.
F. J. Furnivall, Esq.	H. Wedgwood, Esq.
	Professor Goldstücker.

III. That the Committee be authorized to print the Rules drawn up by them, to circulate the printed Copies among all the Members of the Society, and to appoint one of the Society's nights of Meeting for a special discussion of the Rules by Members.

The Committee, or Coleridge himself on its behalf, set to work at once and prepared a draft of the rules, which was discussed, enlarged, and modified, at meetings held in December 1859 and January 1860, further considered and revised in April and May, and finally printed with the title of 'Canones Lexicographici, or rules to be observed in editing the New English Dictionary of the Philological Society'. Continued interest in the work is also shown by a paper read on 10 May, 'Observations on the plan of the Society's proposed new English Dictionary, by the Revd Derwent Coleridge', and by the appearance of a second edition of Dean Trench's two papers 'revised and enlarged. To which is added a letter to the author from Herbert Coleridge, Esq., on the progress and prospects of the Society's New English Dictionary.'

This letter is interesting as a survey of what had so far been accomplished, and closes on a confident note. 'I believe that the scheme is now firmly established, and I confidently expect ... that in about two years we shall be able to give our first number to the world. Indeed, were it not for the dilatoriness of many contributors ... I should not hesitate to name an earlier period.' Here also comes the first mention of co-operation from the English-speaking nation on the other side of the Atlantic. 'The Hon. G. P. Marsh of Burlington, Vermont, having kindly offered to act as secretary in America, I at once suggested that the Americans should make themselves responsible for the whole of the eighteenth-century literature, which probably would have a less chance of finding as many readers in England. This was agreed to, ... and contributors are, as I understand, coming in, but no results of their labours have reached us yet.' The suggestion was not a fortunate one, and was never seriously taken up.

By this time, on the basis of the material already sent in by contributors and of the existing dictionaries, Coleridge was hard at work preparing word-lists to serve as a guide in further collecting. The 'Third Period' was selected for this purpose, and by 14 February 1861, he was able to lay before the Society the first part of this 'Basis of Comparison', covering the letters A to D. The preliminary notice to this in its printed form is signed by Coleridge, and its publication was unfortunately the last of his valuable contributions to the progress of the work. On Thursday, 25 April, 'Mr. Furnivall announced the death on the preceding Tuesday of Herbert Coleridge, Esq., the Editor of the Society's New English Dictionary'. When the second part of the 'Basis of Comparison' (E to L) appeared later in the year, the prefatory note, dated 25 September, and signed by Furnivall, opened with these words: 'Since the publication of the First Part of this Basis, our proposed Dictionary has received a severe blow by the death of its first Editor, the able and accomplished Herbert Coleridge. In its service he caught the cold which resulted in his death. All through his illness he worked for it whenever leisure and strength allowed; and his last attempt at work—two days before he died—was to arrange some of its papers.'

The death of Coleridge at the age of 31 deprived the Dictionary, almost at the outset, of an editor of great promise. In addition to the activities already mentioned, he had compiled and published a Glossarial Index to the printed literature of the thirteenth century, rightly estimating the value of this as a basis for the early history of the language. He had also faced the problem of editing, and 'had prepared a few of the A words for printing, so far as the material sent in to him allowed'; this had been carried as far as the printing of a specimen page containing affect–affection. If this was premature, as it proved to be, it was because the magnitude of the work had not yet become apparent. Clear evidence of this is furnished by the set of specially made pigeon-holes which he considered would be large enough to contain the materials required at the outset. These provide about 260 inches of linear space, which would take no more than about 85,000 'slips'. As many as this were ultimately required for even one of the minor letters of the alphabet. Specimens of the articles prepared by Coleridge were printed in 1862, at the end of Part III of the 'Basis of Comparison', and extracts from others were read at a meeting of the Society on 24 April of the same year.

With Coleridge's death, the editorship passed to Furnivall, then in his thirty-sixth year. He immediately took up the duties, and on 23 May 'made a statement as to the present condition of the collections for the Society's Dictionary, and the course he proposed to pursue with regard to the scheme'. The lines of that course are clearly indicated in the 'Preliminary Notice' mentioned above. He was convinced that the time for editing was still at a distance. 'I have determined to put aside all idea of printing the first part of the Dictionary for four or five years unless some great unexpected help is forthcoming; and I propose, if all go well, to finish this Third-Period Basis early next year; then to compile Two Concise Dictionaries of Early and Middle English, which shall include severally all the materials sent in for the First and Second Periods.'

The magnitude of the task was thus becoming clearer, but in some points its extent was still underrated. 'Meantime,' Furnivall wrote, 'the etymological material will, I trust, be ready.' This was to be done by Dr Carl Lottner on the basis of Worcester's Dictionary, with the precaution that 'his work will be submitted to the Etymological Committee, perhaps before it is printed'. It had not yet become obvious that in many instances only the accumulation of material for the particular word could enable the editor to suggest or establish its real origin.

Another of Furnivall's first tasks was the compilation of a 'List of Books already read, or now (12 July 1861) being read for the Philological Society's New English Dictionary', covering 24 pages and published as an appendix to the Transactions for 1860–1. The numbers given here are: First Period, 143 Works and Authors; Second Period, 486; Third Period, 81. Among the principal readers are Furnivall and Coleridge, Revd J. Eastwood, H. H. Gibbs, E. S. Jackson, Revd Dr Stocker, W. C. Hazlitt, Mr Sprange, etc. The last page contains an intimation 'that the reading of any books not named in the foregoing List will be of service to the Dictionary. A list of those specially recommended to the notice of contributors is in preparation.'

Meanwhile, the Third Part of the 'Basis of Comparison', containing the letters M to Z, was on the way, and was issued in the third week of March 1862. Shortly before its appearance, on 27 February, Furnivall proposed the following resolutions, which were accepted by the Society.

1. That a concise Dictionary be prepared as a preliminary to the Society's proposed new English Dictionary and as a new basis of comparison for all the other periods.

2. That the concise Dictionary shall be as far as possible an abstract of what the large Dictionary should be, and shall contain—the Pronunciation, Critical marks, Etymologies, Roots, Prefixes, Suffixes, Definitions, and Homonyms of the words registered in it, with short quotations (a few words long) and the date and name of the Author for all words for which passages have been sent in to the Editor, and that all words, senses of words, idioms &c. known to exist, but for which authority has not yet been sent to the Editor, be supplied from any other available source and be marked with a * or other sign to denote the want of an authority.

3. That the Editor be authorised to entrust the quotations in his possession, and the sub-editing of any parts of the concise Dictionary to such of the contributors to the Dictionary or other Volunteers as he shall think fit.

It was also resolved:

That Mr. Furnivall be authorised to announce his plan to the contributors in the next part of the Third Period basis to sort the contributions and entrust them to the care of such sub-editors as he thinks fit, and that he be requested to print off at the expense of the Society a specimen of the concise dictionary which he proposes, and to lay it before the Society for their final decision before proceeding further with the printing of such dictionary.

In accordance with this the Third Part of the 'Basis' announced that 'the next step to be taken is to get out the Concise Dictionary hinted at in Part II'. Even this, it was clear, would take time, and 'nothing but the continuous labour of many years can make our Book anything like complete.—Let us then persevere.'

The idea of compiling a concise dictionary as a preliminary to the greater task was adopted by Furnivall on practical grounds; the agreement made with Trübner in 1858 had lapsed in course of time, and he saw no chance of finding another publisher for the larger work. In the expectation that the smaller task could be accomplished in a few years, he even entered into a personal contract with John Murray to have the manuscript ready for the press by the end of 1865. This view of the situation was natural while the material was still comparatively limited in amount. It became more and more unpractical as this continued to accumulate, for it involved the handling and arranging of all the slips for each word before the 'concise' article could be written, and consequently would have taken almost as much time as the preparation of the work on a more ample scale. This must, in time, have become obvious to the few volunteers who actually prepared portions of the Concise Dictionary, and it is not surprising that in the end the idea had to be given up, at considerable pecuniary loss to its originator. Apart from this, the employment of sub-editors was an idea which proved of great value for the later progress of the Dictionary, and to Dr Furnivall belongs the credit of originating the scheme and of issuing instructions for the guidance of these helpers in printed form, on 15 September 1862. Within the next year or two several of them prepared lists of the words coming under the letters which they had undertaken to sub-edit, and these were printed separately when ready, beginning in 1863 with that for B, 'compiled by W. Gee, Esq., sub-editor of the B words for the Concise Dictionary'. This contained no less than 93 pages in triple columns, giving the date of the earliest example of each word in the material, and the latest date for obsolete words, while each word is provided with numbers to indicate the periods (1, 2, and 3) for which there were quotations. Similar lists for N and U–V were issued in 1865. The latter contains a prefatory notice by Furnivall on the progress made in sub-editing, and lists of 'books now in hand for cutting up'. These words indicate a method of collecting material extensively employed from this time onward, by which the reader for the Dictionary was saved much time and labour by being freed from copying the quotations, while the Editor had the advantages of the original print and a fuller context. The defects of the method were that two copies of each book were required to give the full text, and that many early printed works were dealt with in this way which would have been of greater value in the hands of the editors.

From 1862 to 1872 the progress of the Dictionary in Furnivall's hands can be clearly traced in the annual circulars which he sent out to the members of the Philological Society. Portions of these are quoted in the 'Appeal to the English-Speaking Public on behalf of a New English Dictionary', issued by the Revd G. Wheelwright in 1875. A study of them shows considerable activity on the part of readers and sub-editors for the first three or four years, followed by a gradual slackening off, partly due to Furnivall's own increasing absorption in other interests. That for 1872 admitted that 'the progress in the Dictionary work has been so slight that no fresh report in detail is needed'.

These circulars were not included in the printed Transactions of the Philological Society, and in the pages of these there is remarkably little mention of the Dictionary during this period. On 6 November 1868, 'the Hon. Secretary [i.e. Furnivall] made a statement as to the progress of the Society's proposed new English Dictionary, together with a calculation by the Rev. G. Wheelwright, showing that about one-third of the work had been sub-edited'. A still briefer mention occurs under the date of 21 May 1869, and after this the subject does not recur until, in the annual presidential address by Alexander J. Ellis on 15 May 1874, it is included in a survey of the Society's work:

> One of our works, for which great collections have been already made, remains, and may for some time remain, merely one of the things we have tried to do,—of course I allude to our projected dictionary. Several things, indeed, make me inclined to think that a Society is less fitted to compile a dictionary than to get the materials collected.

In the words that follow on this, Ellis clearly indicates that in his opinion the scholar best qualified to edit the Dictionary was Henry Sweet. The Revd Mr Wheelwright's 'Appeal' of the following year is in a more hopeful tone, and indicated the richness of the Dictionary material by giving a specimen of the letter F, which he had sub-edited; this extends to eight pages in triple columns and contains the words from fa to face.

During these years, Furnivall had of course not been idle. Not only had he continued to direct the collecting and sub-editing, but he had immensely increased the possibilities of the Dictionary by the foundation of the Early English Text Society in 1864, and the Chaucer Society in 1868. Without the former of these, the collecting of sufficient Middle English material would have presented almost insuperable difficulties, and in consequence the historical basis for many words would have been defective or altogether lacking. Although he took no part in the actual editing of the Dictionary in its ultimate form, he never ceased to contribute liberally to its stores, both from the publications of these societies and from other sources, including his daily morning and evening paper. If the Dictionary at one period quotes the Daily News and at another the Daily Chronicle, it is because Furnivall had changed his paper in the meanwhile. Through his early organization of the collecting and sub-editing, and his lifelong contributions, the work of Furnivall pervades every page of the Dictionary, and has helped in a great degree to make it what it is. He was fortunate in living long enough to see assured the completion of the work to which he had given so much of his busy life. Almost down to the time of his death in 1910 he still gave evidence of the unremitting activity, and interest in English studies, which had enabled him to achieve so much, while his genial disposition and constant readiness for new friendships explained his success in enlisting the help of others.

II

Before the Dictionary again becomes prominent in the Transactions of the Philological Society, a new and important element had entered into its history. James A. H. Murray, who had been a master at Mill Hill School from 1870, and had already made his mark in philological studies, had been approached in April 1876 by the firm of Macmillan with regard to a new dictionary. The idea of this, a dictionary to rival those of Webster and Worcester, had originated with Harper and Brothers of New York, who wished Macmillan to take part in the enterprise. Acting on the advice of Dr Richard Morris, who had consulted Furnivall in the matter, Macmillan proposed to Murray that he should undertake the editorship. Murray was not prepared to agree to this, unless the new dictionary was to be a great advance on the existing ones in respect of scholarship. Macmillan had heard of the intentions of the Philological Society, and asked whether the material already collected for it might not be available. Having, as the result of this suggestion, obtained some portions of the material, Murray prepared specimens of the kind of dictionary which he considered would be worth doing, and these were put into type. His ideas went far beyond those of the publishers, and a considerable time was spent in trying various modifications, till these reached the lowest point which in his opinion would have any real value. The divergent views of the publishers on this head were capable of adjustment, but difficulties arose in connection with the terms for the use of the Society's materials, and the negotiations came to an end.

The exhibition of the specimens produced from the material already collected, however, had the effect of again interesting the Philological Society in its old project. By May 1877 matters had begun to move; a letter from Furnivall written in that month tells where the various letters of the alphabet were to be found in the hands of the sub-editors. It was fortunate that the scattered material was, with the exception of one small portion, actually recoverable; one sub-editor, sending part of what he had, promised 'to search for the rest, which had been disposed by his wife in a lumber-room'.

Encouraged by these signs of new life, the Society again began to look round for a publisher, but at first without result, for with its small membership and limited funds the Society itself had nothing to offer but the material for the Dictionary, and no publisher was prepared to face the expenditure that would be required. Early in 1877, however, there were already foreshadowings of the ultimate connection with the Oxford University Press. Details of the scheme were submitted on behalf of the Society, and at the request of the Delegates a specimen of the proposed work was prepared by Murray. This was ultimately approved to such an extent that 'in the Spring of 1878, the then President of the Society, Mr H. Sweet, was authorized to open negotiations with the Delegates for the publication of the Dictionary'. As the prime mover in this new development, Murray also had a meeting with the Delegates at Oxford on 26 April, and 'thought there was good hope that the issue would be favourable'. This impression was confirmed by a letter (communicated to the Society on May 17) 'from the Secretary of the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, Prof. Bartholomew Price, saying that the Delegates had authorized him to enter into negotiations with the Society for the publication of the Dictionary on the basis of the terms submitted by the President to the Delegacy. The Council had accordingly directed the Dictionary Committee to meet Prof. Price, and try to come to terms with him.' Two such meetings were held before 21 June, and a basis of agreement was arrived at in the following October.

'The substance of the proposals' made by the Society as a basis for negotiation 'was, that the Delegates should advance the capital required for completing and publishing the work, that the gross profits should in the first place be applied exclusively to repaying their advances with interest, the net profits being then divided equally between the Delegates and the Society, that Dr J. A. H. Murray should be the Editor, and that he should be allowed ten years to complete the work in'. Various alterations were made in these proposals before the terms were finally embodied in two contracts, one between the Delegates and the Society, and the other between them and Dr Murray. In order to enter into this contract the Society had to be incorporated on a legal basis, and was registered in proper form on 2 January 1879. The contract, which is dated 1 March 1879, is printed in an Appendix to the Society's Transactions for 1877–9, where it occupies ten pages, with the addition of a specimen page of the proposed Dictionary, containing the words castle and persuade, and some subordinate entries based on these. At that stage the Dictionary contemplated was one estimated 'to occupy not less than 6,000 nor more than 7,000 pages, ... and the said Dictionary shall be edited and prepared on the same principles and on the same lines of historical and linguistic evidence as to the forms and meanings of its words, as are shown in the Specimen page, and shall contain on its title page "Founded mainly on the materials collected by the Philological Society" '. This work is referred to in the contract as the 'principal dictionary', but provision was made for either party at a later date proceeding to compile and publish 'a larger dictionary containing not fewer than ten volumes, each containing not less than 1,600 pages of the size of the said Specimen page'. This was, in fact, a pretty close estimate of the size to which the Dictionary ultimately grew, and as early as November 1881 there was some anticipation of this growth, when the Delegates agreed to an increase in the number of pages from 6,400 to 8,400.

There are many other details in the contract which are interesting in themselves, or in the light of the later fortunes of the Dictionary, but on which it is not necessary to enlarge. The great facts which it embodied were that the Society had at last found its publisher, the Delegates had undertaken a task more magnificent than they knew of, and the Dictionary had found an editor capable of converting its latent possibilities into a great reality.

During the earlier part of these negotiations, however, Dr Murray had not definitely contemplated undertaking the editorship of the Dictionary, although he had taken a leading part in furthering the idea that it was something to be done. It was only when the necessity for a decision was forced upon him, by his being assured that the fate of the Dictionary depended on his acceptance, that he reluctantly agreed to assume the responsibility for a task which was even then formidable enough, though its full weight was not yet apparent. Several serious questions had to be faced in making this decision. It would be necessary to do the editing in addition to his work at Mill Hill School, even if he might be relieved of part of this. The housing of so great a mass of material could be satisfactorily accomplished only by providing special accommodation for it, and this and other necessary aids to the work involved at the outset the expenditure of private means in addition to the provision made by the Delegates. In spite of all these deterrents, he boldly faced the task, and set about providing the Dictionary with a home, and making it possible for himself to work at it. By the middle of February (he told the Society in May 1879) 'I had commenced the erection of an iron building, detached from my dwelling-house, to serve as a Scriptorium, and to accommodate safely and conveniently the materials. This has been fitted with blocks of pigeon-holes, 1,029 in number, for the reception of the alphabetically arranged slips, and with writing desks, reference desks, and other conveniences for the extensive apparatus required. On Lady Day . . . I received from Mr. Furnivall some ton and three-quarters of materials which had accumulated under his roof as sub-editor after sub-editor fell off in his labours. With a considerable body of assistants I have been engaged since that date, as to all appearance I must be for many months to come, in turning out, examining, sorting, and bestowing these materials.'

By the tenth of May, with a few exceptions, all the material in the hands of the sub-editors had either been sent in, or satisfactorily accounted for. It had, indeed, been widely scattered, and not only in Britain; the letter H came back all the way from Florence. Although so much of it was still in an undigested state, it was soon obvious that even all this mass was inadequate for the production of a satisfactory Dictionary on the lines that had been laid down. The material for many words, especially the commoner words, was obviously defective, and required to be augmented as rapidly as possible. A fresh appeal was made for voluntary readers, and even in April 1879 a number had come forward to help. At the end of that month, the Clarendon Press printed a thousand copies of 'An Appeal to the English-speaking and English-reading public to read books and make extracts for the Philological Society's New English Dictionary'. This appeal covers four pages, of which the first two summarize the history of the Dictionary from 1857 to 1879, the third explains the reading still required, and the fourth contains the statement 'A thousand readers are wanted, and confidently asked for, to complete the work as far as possible within the next three years'. To this are added four pages of book lists, and a set of directions to readers. This appeal, of which another five hundred copies were issued later, met with a gratifying response, and enabled the compilation of the Dictionary to be undertaken with confidence in the result.

The arranging of the old material in the Scriptorium, the organizing of the fresh collecting, and extensive correspondence with readers and sub-editors, were tasks which at first left but little time for the actual preparation of the Dictionary, or even for consideration of the many points which had to be settled before a real beginning could be made. For many of these there was no model which could be followed; they involved totally new principles in English lexicography, and required both scholarship and practical judgement to solve them satisfactorily. Coleridge and Furnivall had shown a sound understanding of what was necessary as a foundation for the Dictionary; to Murray belongs the credit of giving it, at the outset, a form which proved to be adequate to the end, standing the test of fifty years without requiring any essential modification to adapt it to the steady advance of English scholarship or the accession of new material.

III

At this point it will be well, both for the sake of greater clearness and of giving credit where credit is due, to give some account of the method of collecting the material for the Dictionary and of the work done by the voluntary readers and sub-editors. Each member of these two classes stood to the final editors in a relation similar to that which Socrates in the Ion compares to the magnet and the suspended rings, each depending on and operating through the other, although in the case of the Dictionary the order of their sequence was reversed.

The example of Johnson and Richardson had shown clearly that the citation of authority for a word was one of the essentials for establishing its meaning and tracing its history. It was therefore obvious that the first step towards the building up of a new dictionary must be the assembling of such authority, in the form of quotations from English writings throughout the various periods of the language. Johnson and Richardson had been selective in the material they assembled, and obviously some kind of selection would be imposed by practical limits, however wide the actual range might be. This was a point on which control was difficult; the one safeguard was that the care and judgement of some readers would make up for the possible deficiencies of others.

By the directions which were issued to intending readers in 1858, and again in 1879, uniformity in the method of presenting the quotations was attained. Each was written on a separate slip of paper, at first of the size of a half-sheet of note-paper, latterly of a quarter of a sheet of foolscap, except when readers who supplied their own paper (such as Dr Furnivall, Dr Fitzedward Hall, and the Revd W. B. R. Wilson) wrote on pieces of any size or quality that came to hand. This difference in size makes it easy to distinguish the slips belonging to the two periods of collecting. When completed, the normal slip presented three things, (1) the word for which it was selected, written in the upper left-hand corner, (2) the date, author, title, page, etc., of the work cited, and (3) the quotation itself, either in full, or in an adequate form. A typical slip therefore presented something like the following appearance:

Britisher

1883 Freeman Impressions U.S. iv. 29

I always told my American friends that I had rather be called a Britisher than an Englishman, if by calling me an Englishman they meant to imply that they were not Englishmen themselves.

To obviate the tedium of repeating item (2) over and over again on hundreds of slips, it was in a large number of instances printed on each, in accordance with an estimate of the number that would be required for the particular book, or was supplied by stamping after the quotations themselves had been written. In this way, too, it was easier to make the references to page, chapter, line, etc., conform to general rules.

How the readers were to be guided in their selection of words was thus explained in the directions issued in 1879:

> Make a quotation for every word that strikes you as rare, obsolete, old-fashioned, new, peculiar, or used in a peculiar way.
> Take special note of passages which show or imply that a word is either new and tentative, or needing explanation as obsolete or archaic, and which thus help to fix the date of its introduction or disuse.
> Make as many quotations as you can for ordinary words, especially when they are used significantly, and tend by the context to explain or suggest their own meaning.

It is obvious that these rules would apply in very varying degrees to different books, and that the task of some readers would be much more difficult and extensive than that of others in books of the same size. The amount undertaken or done by the different readers also varied enormously. In both periods of collecting there were a number who were marvels of industry and whose mark is plain on almost every page of the Dictionary to those who can recognize it. With these on the one hand, and the large army of lesser, but often important, contributors on the other, it is not surprising that the piles of quotations grew into the interminable series that filled to overflowing the pigeon-holes of the Scriptorium. How rapidly the material increased in the periods of greatest activity will best be realized by a few of the passages relating to this phase of the work. In May 1879, in response to the appeal issued at the end of April, '165 readers have offered themselves, 128 of these have chosen their books, been supplied with slips, and are now at work for us. The number of books actually undertaken and entered against readers is 234; arrangements are in progress for perhaps as many more.' A year later the number of readers had risen to 754. 'Altogether 1,568 books have been undertaken, of which 924 have been finished', and 'the total number of printed slips supplied to readers now amounts to 625,035, while the quotations returned are 361,670'. Of these readers some had sent in a large number of slips varying from 4,500 to 11,000. By another year (1881) 'the number of readers has now risen to upwards of 800, of whom 510 are still at work. The slips issued now number 817,625, and the quotations returned 656,900.' The total number of authors then represented in the Reference Index was 2,700, and the titles numbered some 4,500.

Many of the particulars of this remarkable activity were given in the preface to the first volume of the Dictionary, and a full list of the readers and the books read by them between 1879 and 1884, with the approximate number of quotations supplied by each, forms an appendix of 32 pages to the Presidential Address for 1884 (pp. 101–42).

On looking over this list, the observant reader will notice that the interest in the Dictionary which at its first beginning had been manifested in the United States had been maintained, though not on the lines suggested by Coleridge. The interest, and the results it produced, are specially referred to by Dr Murray in his Presidential Address for 1880 in these words:

> In connexion with the Reading, I cannot sufficiently express my appreciation of the kindness of our friends in the United States, where the interest taken in our scheme, springing from a genuine love of our common language, its history, and a warm desire to make the Dictionary worthy of that language, has impressed me very deeply. I do not hesitate to say that I find in Americans an ideal love for the English language as a glorious heritage, and a pride in being intimate with its grand memories, such as one does find sometimes in a classical scholar in regard to Greek, but which is rare indeed in Englishmen towards their own tongue; and from this I draw the most certain inferences as to the lead which Americans must at no distant date take in English scholarship.

Dr Murray then specially refers to the services rendered by Prof. Francis A. March of Lafayette College in directing the reading done in the United States at that time, and adds:

> There is another feature of American help to which I must allude, because it contrasts with that we have obtained in England—I refer to that offered to the Dictionary by men of Academic standing in the States. The number of Professors in American Universities and Colleges included among our readers is very large; and in several instances a professor has put himself down for a dozen works, which he has undertaken to read personally, and with the help of his students. We have had no such help from any college or university in Great Britain; only one or two Professors of English in this country have thought the matter of sufficient importance to talk to their students about it, and advise them to help us.

By far the greater part of the material supplied by these American readers, it may be noted, was of the same type as that furnished by the British contributors, that is, it was mainly drawn from literary or scientific works written in standard English, or without noticeable American features in vocabulary or idiom. It was thus very serviceable in supplementing the English evidence, but failed to a very large extent to bring out the special developments of the language in the American colonies and the United States. Much of the material for these was specially supplied during the progress of the Dictionary by one or two workers, notably by Mr Albert Matthews of Boston.

In addition to the quotations supplied by all this new reading, a few collections of Dictionary material, which had already been made by various persons, were by them generously handed over for use in the new work. If the Dictionary as it stands is a monument of scholarship, it is also one of unselfish giving on the part of a great number of men and women whose nameless contributions form the foundation of almost every article it contains.

Only second in value to the work done by the voluntary readers was that of the volunteer sub-editors. Without these, the mere handling and reducing to alphabetical order of three and a half millions of slips would have formed a task sufficiently heavy to delay for some years the actual preparation of the Dictionary. Even those who did no more than this rendered good service, but most of them went much farther, and so arranged and subdivided the words they dealt with, and defined their various senses, that their work was of real value in the final editing. It is with good reason, therefore, that the portions done by each were carefully recorded in the various reports on the Dictionary presented to the Philological Society and in the Preface to each letter in the Dictionary itself.

IV

Amid all the turmoil of assembling the old material, collecting the new, and reducing both to some kind of orderly arrangement, Dr Murray was working out the lines on which the editing of the Dictionary was to proceed. The problem of the best means of indicating the pronunciation, for example, was under consideration for a long time, and was decided only after the views of various authorities had been duly taken into account. Correspondence on this subject with Isaac Pitman, James Lecky, and W. R. Evans, was still in progress in the summer and autumn of 1881 and the spring of 1882, and the notation finally adopted was submitted to, and accepted by, the Council of the Society on 17 March of that year.

Meanwhile the preparation of the letter A was making progress with the material then available. As early as 16 May 1879 this had advanced as far as aby, covering 557 words, and providing enough copy to make 36 pages of the Dictionary. A year later this had increased to 160 pages, going as far as al. By May 1881 the question of typography was being discussed, and there is mention of a specimen page in June. About the same time, the desire to settle down definitely to the real work of editing becomes obvious in the statement that 'the general amassing of quotations must cease with the present year'.

It had been estimated that three years would be required for all this preparatory work, and the estimate proved to be correct. On 19 April 1882, the first batch of copy went to the printer, and in his report to the Philological Society on 19 May, Dr Murray had the satisfaction of being able to announce 'the great fact . . . that the Dictionary is now at last really launched, and that some forty pages are in type, of which 48 columns have reached me in proof'. To fill the first part, however, extending from A to ant, more than a thousand columns were necessary, and the task of providing these occupied the remainder of that year, and the greater part of the next. Finally, on 18 January 1884, advance copies of Part I were exhibited at a meeting of the Society, publication took place on 1 February, and the 'New English Dictionary' at once took its place as an incomparable record of the English tongue, far surpassing all that had as yet been accomplished or even dreamt of in the field of lexicography.

The beginning had been made; how to continue the work rapidly was the next question that called for solution. Simple arithmetic indicated that there was need for an increased rate of production, though it was not clear how this was to be attained. In May 1884 Dr Murray thought that with six good assistants 'it might be possible to produce two parts in the year, and thus finish the work in 11 years from next March'. This suggestion was no doubt justified by the facts as they were at that time. That it failed to work out was certainly due in great part to the fact that A was not a good letter on which to base the calculation, and to a steady increase in the material which could not at that time be foreseen.

All the work necessary to produce the first part had been done in the original Scriptorium at Mill Hill. It was clear that greater progress could be made if the editor could devote all his time to the work and be in closer touch with the printing at the Clarendon Press. As early as 1882 the idea of removal to Oxford had been suggested, but it was only towards the end of 1884 that the proposals began to take definite shape. The practical aspects of the question having been settled, the removal took place in 1885; a new Scriptorium was erected in the garden of the house at 78 Banbury Road, and here Dr Murray and his staff carried on their work for the next thirty years. The Scriptorium was not in itself lacking in space, but when into it were packed all the accumulated material, the necessary works of reference, and the tables, desks, and chairs required by the editor and six or seven assistants, it presented a crowded scene to the eye of the visitor. If John Baret had been able to look into it, he would have hailed it as another Alvearie, with a swarm of workers as busy as those who helped him to compile his own volume.

In the new quarters the Dictionary continued to make progress, and Part II, containing the words from Ant to Batten, appeared in 1885. By that time it had become plain that some editorial co-operation was necessary to increase the rate at which successive parts could be produced. Here again the Dictionary was fortunate, as it had already been in rising, in Dr Murray's hands, out of the apparent impasse into which it had fallen ten years before. When Part I was published, the editor of the Academy handed it for review to Henry Bradley, who had but lately arrived in London, and was yet comparatively unknown in the world of scholarship. His review, which appeared in two parts, on 16 February and 1 March, at once marked him out as one of the few who were competent either to appreciate the Dictionary at its proper value, or to offer useful criticism. So clear an indication of possible help was not overlooked, and by July Bradley was assisting in the preparation of the latter part of B. From January 1888 he was independently editing the letter E, and continued with this and F while still engaged in other work in London. In 1896 he also moved to Oxford, and with his staff found quarters in the Clarendon Press itself.

From 1888 there were thus two distinct sections of the Dictionary simultaneously in progress, Dr Murray doing the whole volume occupied by C, and the half volume containing D, while Bradley completed that volume with E, and began the next (Vol. IV) with F. Down to 1900 the letters published, with the respective dates of the preparation of each, stand as follows:

A B	1882–8
C	1888–93	E	1888–93
D	1893–7	F	1893–7
H	1897–9	G	1897–1900

In all this work the part played by the assistants who formed the staff of each editor was of the greatest importance. While considerable training and experience are required by every one, however well qualified, it is also true that the real dictionary worker is born and not made, and that no application or diligence will ever make up for the lack of natural aptitude for the work. The two earlier editors, and those who came later, were fortunate in having the services of a number of such assistants, some of whom (and those among the best) became connected with the Dictionary in its earlier stages and remained faithful to it for periods of twenty, thirty, and even forty years. Without their unflagging and efficient aid, no editor could have coped with the task without so much expenditure of his own time that the end of it would have been beyond all calculation. If those who read the original prefaces to the various letters will note the names that occur time after time at the end of these, they will do right to recognize that the bearers of these names have throughout many years borne the greater share of the labour by which the Dictionary was made possible.

Among these assistants a natural subdivision of labour readily established itself according to the special interests of each. Some became experts in preparing copy for the printer, drafting articles which required only a few editorial changes, or actually writing them in a form which admitted little or no improvement. To these fell the task of taking up the work already done by the sub-editors, of incorporating new material, of making fresh additions that were obviously required, of distinguishing senses and sub-senses, of writing the definitions, and of reconciling the historical order of the senses with their logical development from the original meaning of the word. This became a highly complicated task in the case of common words with a long history, such as the most frequently used verbs, adverbs, or prepositions. The difficulty of these had become apparent even in the early period of the work, and formed the subject of comment by Dr Murray in 1881:

> In returning to me his last batch, Mr. Jacob mentioned to me that the division of the meanings of the verb Set, and the attempt to put them in satisfactory order, had occupied him over 40 hours. In examining his results, with 51 senses of the simple verb, and 83 of phrases like set-out, set-off, set-down,—134 divisions in all—I do not wonder at the time. I suspect that the Editor will have to give 40 more to it, for the language seems not to contain a more perplexing word that Set, which occupies more than two columns of Webster, and will probably fill three of our large quarto pages.

When set finally came to be done, more than thirty years later, it took nearer 40 days than 40 hours to digest the mass of examples which had accumulated by that time; the word occupies a column more than 18 pages of the Dictionary, and extends to 154 main divisions, the last of which (set up) has so many subdivisions that it exhausts the alphabet and repeats the letters down to rr. Other words like get, give, go, put, take, may not rival this, but each of them required a vast amount of preliminary labour on the part of some assistant, which was of the greatest value in saving the time of the editor and giving him a clear basis on which to work.

Other assistants developed special ability in checking and verifying references readily and correctly, in finding earlier or desirable examples of words or uses, or in reading proofs and making additions to the material at that stage. When a staff had all these elements properly represented and distributed in it, and certain preliminaries to the work on each letter (such as the copying of glossaries, concordances, and indexes) had been fully carried out, steady progress could be made, and was made to an extent which seemed marvellous to foreign scholars acquainted with the difficulties of lexicography, but unfamiliar with the practical methods of overcoming them.

For the obtaining of full or accurate information on special points, it was frequently necessary to apply to outside authorities of the most varied kind. The services rendered by these were partly acknowledged on the title-page of the earlier parts and volumes in the words 'With the assistance of many scholars and men of science'. How many these were may be seen at large in the original prefaces to the various letters, but it should also be noted that there were many in those lists who would not have claimed to belong to either of these learned classes, but who could and did supply the information wanted with a clearness and fullness which made the editor's task easy, and gave him confidence in the correctness of his statements. If various errors to be found in standard works are not repeated in the Dictionary, it is frequently because someone with a practical knowledge of the subject had been specially consulted on the point, and had freely given the information required.

When the Dictionary had reached the stage of the first proof (regularly supplied in sets of eight columns), it was found to be of much value to send these to various readers deeply interested in the work, to receive the benefit of their criticisms, suggestions, and additions. In this way many improvements were made, errors and misprints eliminated, and the history of words and senses more fully illustrated. In the latter respect the contributions of Dr Fitzedward Hall were of special value by reason of his own collection of material. His regular reading of the proofs extended over some twenty years, and after his death his collections for the later letters were placed at the service of the editors. Among nearly a score of others who reviewed the proofs for shorter or longer periods special mention should be made of Mr Henry Hucks Gibbs (Lord Aldenham), who also in other ways gave valuable help and encouragement in the early stages of the work; of Miss Edith Thompson of Bath, Canon Fowler of Durham, and Mr A. Caland of Wageningen in Holland, who not only supplied many fresh quotations, but as a foreign student of English frequently noticed points which did not so readily strike the native eye.

Although two editors and their staffs had been working separately from 1888, it was still considered by the Delegates of the Clarendon Press that the rate of progress ought to be increased, and it was clear that this could only be done by the appointment of a third editor. With this in view, William Alexander Craigie, then a lecturer at the University of St Andrews, was invited to Oxford in the summer of 1897, and after assisting Dr Bradley with the letter G, and Dr Murray with I and K, began separate editing with Q in 1901. From that date two sections of the Dictionary had their home in the Old Ashmolean Building in Broad Street, which had been left vacant by the removal of the Museum some years before. To these a third was added in 1914, when Charles Talbut Onions, who had at Dr Murray's invitation joined the staff in 1895, and had between 1906 and 1913 prepared special portions of M, N, R, and S, began with a separate staff to edit the later portion of that letter (Su–Sz).

With four editors and their staffs concurrently at work prospects for an early conclusion to the whole seemed brighter than they had ever been since the full magnitude of the undertaking became apparent. Unfortunately it was not long before various events began to mar these prospects, and bring unwelcome delays. The outbreak of the Great War soon began to reduce the staffs by withdrawing from them their younger members, and in time even some of those more mature in years. The loss of these trained workers for three or four years was naturally a serious handicap for those that remained. The next severe blow was the death of Sir James Murray (he had been knighted in 1908) on 26 July 1915, after more than thirty-eight years of connection with the Dictionary and thirty-three during which he had supplied copy to the printer without intermission. The transference of his staff to the Old Ashmolean, or to quarters near it, helped greatly to strengthen the three remaining sections, but there was no possibility of compensating for the loss that the work had sustained. If his wish had been fulfilled to the extent of seeing his eightieth birthday in 1917, it would not have coincided with the end of the Dictionary, as he had hoped, but those two years would have brought the completion of the work appreciably nearer in spite of the difficulties of the time.

With the end of the war, some of the assistants returned to their posts, and for some four years the work went on steadily (although the two younger editors were not continuously engaged on it nor able to give their whole time to it), until the death of Dr Bradley on 23 May 1923 removed another of its mainstays. By that time it was clearly too late to think of finding another editor; the best that could be done was to make full use of the more experienced assistants in the preparation of special sections of the letters that still remained. By this means it was possible for Dr Craigie, in spite of his removal to the University of Chicago in 1925, to take part with Dr Onions in the editing of W, and so enable the work to be finished in the beginning of 1928, almost exactly seventy years from the date on which the Philological Society had decided to make 'a completely new English Dictionary'.

With work on three or four letters going on simultaneously, and publication of each taking place as soon as the sections were ready, the sequence of the various parts of the Dictionary became more irregular after 1900, as will be seen from the following table:

Murray	Bradley	Craigie	Onions
I J K 1899–1901
	L 1901–3
O 1902–4		Q 1902
		R–Re 1903–5
P 1904–9	M 1904–8	N 1906–7
		Re–Ry 1907–10
	S–Sh 1908–14
T 1909–15	St 1914–19	Si–Sq 1910–15

	W–We 1920–3	U 1921–6	X Y Z 1920–1
		Wo–Wy 1927	Wh–Wo 1922–7

The total number of pages in the first edition was 15,487; of these no less than 7,207, or nearly half of the entire work were edited by Sir James Murray.

The early volumes of the Dictionary were as a rule published in parts of 352 pages at a price of twelve shillings and sixpence each, with three smaller sections introduced to make the divisions coincide with the end of the letters B, C, and E. The size of these parts necessarily involved a considerable time in the preparation of each, and a corresponding interval between the dates of publication. Towards the end of 1894 it was decided that a shortening of these intervals was desirable, and the new arrangement explained in the following announcement was adopted.

> The Letters, A, B, C, and E of this great undertaking having been already published, the Delegates of the Clarendon Press have been urged from many quarters to consider the more frequent publication of the subsequent portions of the work, in smaller instalments, as each is completed by the Editors, so as to supply students of the English Language and Literature more promptly with the results of the latest researches.
> In response to this demand, the Delegates have arranged for the punctual issue of the letters D and F in Quarterly Sections. The new issue will begin with the simultaneous publication of the opening part of each letter on November 15, and further instalments of the Editors' work will be regularly published thereafter on the first day of each Quarter, in such alternation as may seem desirable. The Delegates have no reason to fear any interruption in the continuous publication of the Dictionary on this plan.

This expectation was realized, and quarterly sections of 64 pages, or double sections of 128 (occasionally even a triple section of 192) were steadily issued for the next twenty years, until the reduction of staffs caused by the war, and other losses, made it impossible to continue with the same regularity. For the convenience of those who preferred them, however, the larger twelve-and-sixpenny parts were still issued whenever a sufficient number of consecutive single or double sections were available to make one.

At the time this change was made, a new name for the Dictionary was also introduced, though no change was made on the title-page. On the cover of the section containing Deceit to Deject, published on 1 January 1895, above the title, appeared for the first time the designation 'The Oxford English Dictionary', which was repeated on every section and part issued after 1 July of that year. The new name, being more distinctive than the old, steadily came more and more into use, and the abbreviation OED tended to supplant NED, although the latter was frequently employed for many years. A third abbreviation, HED (with H for Historical), though employed for a number of year in Notes and Queries, never attained general currency. Popularly the work was often referred to as Murray's, and the Philological Society by a natural tradition has continued to call it 'the Society's Dictionary'.

VI

During all these years of work, in addition to the growing appreciation which it steadily received, the progress of the Dictionary was diversified by a few extraneous events. On 12 October 1897, a large number of the readers, sub-editors, assistants, and other helpers were enabled to meet each other at Oxford by the generosity of the Provost and Fellows of The Queen's College, who on that date gave a complimentary dinner to 'Dr. Murray, Mr. Bradley, and some others who have helped in the production of the Historical English Dictionary'. The time was a fortunate one, for in that year it was still possible for some of the early workers to shake hands with those who were just beginning to take up the task which they had already carried on so long. Only a small number of the company which met that evening lived long enough to see the completion of the work.

In the same year the Dictionary was by permission dedicated to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, as intimated on a special page inserted in the part for January 1898.

Up to 1905 the whole expense of preparing and printing the Dictionary was borne by the Oxford University Press. In that year, however, a contribution was made towards the cost of the sixth volume, which was also recorded on a separate page in these words:

> This sixth volume is a memorial of the munificence of the Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths, who have generously contributed five thousand pounds towards its production.

When the completed dictionary was published in April 1928, the first copies were presented to His Majesty King George, and to Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, as the highest representatives of the two great English-speaking nations.

On 6 June of the same year the Goldsmiths' Company celebrated the completion of the work by a dinner in the Company's hall in London, at which contributors and workers again had an opportunity of meeting, and of hearing the Prime Minister, Mr Stanley Baldwin, commend the results of their labours in eloquent and graceful terms.

During the progress of the work academic honours were from time to time conferred upon the editors by various universities, and at its completion the University of Oxford marked the occasion by conferring the honorary degree of D.Litt. on the two surviving editors, the Secretary to the Delegates of the Press, the Publisher to the University, and the Printer to the University.

Sir James Murray, as already mentioned, had in recognition of his services to scholarship received the honour of knighthood in 1908, the announcement being made in the Birthday list of 26 June, and the same distinction was bestowed on the third editor in the Birthday list of 3 June, 1928.

After the completion of the Dictionary in 1928, editorial work did not immediately cease. Since the OED had been published over a period of forty-four years, it was inevitable that many later additions to the language, both of new words and of new senses, should be lacking in the earlier volumes, and that even the later should to some extent present similar deficiencies. To remedy this as far as possible, the succeeding five years were devoted to the preparation of a supplementary volume, the scope of which is explained in the next section. After this work had been finished the original ten-volume New English Dictionary on Historical Principles was, in August 1933, reissued as The Oxford English Dictionary in twelve volumes. An additional volume was issued at the same time, containing the Supplement of new words and meanings, the Additions and Emendations prefixed to the original volumes, revised and amplified, a List of Spurious Words, and a List of Books quoted in the principal work; this last forming, as the 1933 Preface has it, 'a bibliography of English literature such as does not exist elsewhere'.

THE FIRST SUPPLEMENT, 1928–1933

From the earliest days of the publication of the Dictionary it had been envisaged that a Supplement or Supplements might be necessary, in order to keep the historical record of the language up to date, and to take account of subsequent research into the vocabulary already covered by the Dictionary. This possibility had been kept in view not only by members of the Dictionary staff but also by a certain number of the regular 'readers' who maintained a continuous flow of contributions to the material from which the work was being compiled; moreover, communications of corrections and additions were constantly sent in by many interested users of the published work. Consequently, when the original Dictionary was completed in 1928, a great body of quotations had been amassed with a view to a Supplement on a grand scale, which should not only treat the new words and new meanings that had come into being during the publications of the successive sections of the Dictionary, but should also correct and amplify the evidence for what was already in print. It was soon discovered, however, that such a Supplement, if it were to be at all a worthy and adequate addition to the main work, would demand intensive research by experienced workers extending over many years. This course could not be contemplated when the possibility of preparing a Supplement was considered as work drew to an end on the original Dictionary.

It was therefore resolved to produce a supplementary volume, the scope of which would in the main be restricted to the treatment of those accessions of words and senses which had taken place during the preceding fifty years. To this limitation there were to be two principal exceptions: items of modern origin and contemporary currency that had been either intentionally or accidentally omitted from the Dictionary would be included, and account would be taken of earlier evidence for American uses, which Sir William Craigie, at that time editing the Dictionary of American English in Chicago, was in a position to supply. Temporary or casual uses were recognized only in so far as they marked stages in the recent history of scientific discovery, invention, or fashion, or illustrated the progress of thought, usage, or custom during the half-century then under review. A few important corrections or amplifications of existing definitions were introduced under the necessity of bringing the work into line with recent research. The details of this policy were established by Dr C. T. Onions, under whose editorship the first Supplement to the OED was published in 1933.

The chief characteristics of the vocabulary set forth in the 1933 Supplement can be summarized briefly: on the technical side, it exhibited the great enlargement of the terminology of the arts and sciences at the close of the nineteenth century and in the early years of the twentieth—biochemistry, radio telegraphy and telephony, mechanical transport on land, at sea, and in the air, psychoanalysis, the cinema, to name a few outstanding subjects; on the purely linguistic side, the varied development of colloquial idiom and slang, to which the United States of America had made a large contribution, but in which the British dominions and dependencies of the time also contributed a conspicuous share. As in the main work, there was continually present the problem of the inclusion or omission of the more esoteric scientific terms and of the many foreign words reflecting the widened interest in the conditions and customs of distant countries; it was acknowledged that the problem had not been satisfactorily and comprehensively solved in every instance, as the material from which the Supplement was compiled had been collected principally while the original Dictionary was still in preparation, and following the same guidelines in operation during that work. In one respect the 1933 Supplement went somewhat beyond the limits of the main Dictionary, in its more generous inclusion of proper names; but even so, these were not admitted unless they had some allusive interest or were important for some linguistic, literary, or historical reason.

The result was a Supplement of over 800 pages which went far towards completing the documentation of the English language up to the end of the first quarter of the twentieth century and just beyond. However, extensive though it was, it still represented only a restricted selection from a large collection of material from which a much larger volume might have been produced. Once it had been completed, the OED team dispersed, and the editorial staff, including the last surviving Editor of the original Dictionary still in Oxford, Dr C. T. Onions, turned to other work. The OED library in Oxford was broken up, and quotation slips that had not been used were stored away, some later to be dispatched to other historical dictionary projects, notably for use in the preparation of the Middle English Dictionary at Ann Arbor, Michigan and the projected dictionary of Early Modern English.

A SUPPLEMENT TO THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY, 1957–1986[1]

After the Second World War the Delegates of the University Press decided to re-establish a headquarters for the Dictionary in Oxford, and to prepare a revised version of the 1933 Supplement. In the end, this proved to be an even greater work than that which circumstances had forbidden in 1928, an addition to the main Dictionary of one-third of its size, taking almost thirty years to prepare. But this was not foreseen at the time. The original intention was simply to amplify the existing Supplement in a single-volume work of some 1,275 pages which would take account of the lexical development in English throughout the first half of the twentieth century. In 1957, R. W. Burchfield, a New Zealander who was then Lecturer in English Language and Literature at Christ Church, Oxford, and formerly a Rhodes Scholar at the University, accepted the invitation of the Delegates to edit the Supplement. It was envisaged that this new Supplement would take about seven years to complete.

At this stage, the editorial office of the Dictionary was located on one floor of a private house, No. 40 Walton Crescent, adjacent to the University Press's printing works and to the Clarendon Press itself. The presence in Oxford of Dr C. T. Onions provided valuable continuity between the OED and the projected new Supplement, and at the time it was still possible for the editor to receive the advice and encouragement of a small number of people who had worked on or for the

[1] The Editor's own account of this project may be read in the prefatory sections of the four volumes of the Supplement, especially the Introduction to Volume I (A–G), on which the present narrative has drawn.

Dictionary in other capacities. However, the lapse of some twenty years since the disbanding of the original OED staff meant that one of the first duties incumbent on the new editor was the selection and training of new assistants. In the days of the Dictionary itself, Sir James Murray had often found the recruitment of suitable staff to be a problematic and uncertain affair, and so it proved again. Gradually, though, the initial difficulties began to subside, and early work in the preparation of the new Supplement began to take a steadier course.

The raw material for a dictionary on historical principles—a file of quotations excerpted from the literature of the period treated—was almost entirely lacking. Among the material left behind after work on the 1933 Supplement there was indeed a collection of quotations numbering about 140,000, few of which had appeared in the Supplement itself, which included illustrative examples of words excluded in 1933 because they were not fully established at the time. Though useful, these materials fell far short of what was needed, both in quantity and range: the whole literature of the eventful quarter-century since 1933 had to be sifted from scratch. In 1957 an extensive reading programme was inaugurated, covering printed sources of all kinds relating to late nineteenth- and twentieth-century English. The sources included all the important literary works, as well as many hundreds of popular titles, a wide range of scientific books and journals, and large numbers of newspapers and periodicals, ranging from the national press to the publications of the 'underground'. Numerous works containing lexicographical information, such as Notes and Queries, American Speech, and many dictionaries of regionalisms, slang, jargon, and technical language, were converted into the form of dictionary slips. In addition, several valuable private collections were submitted to the Press, and these were also added to the quotation files. Thanks to these and subsequent valuable donations, to the comprehensiveness of the reading programme, to the alertness of the departmental staff in their private reading, and to the regular contributions of scholars and voluntary readers, the quotation file grew to contain at least two million, and possibly three million, slips by the time of the completion of the Supplement, and proved an excellent resource from which to make the initial selection of items for inclusion in the dictionary and from which to document the history of each term up to the present day.

At the same time it was necessary to build up a reference library of books in the department to which staff could turn for additional information about items for which entries were being prepared. Some volumes from the 1933 Supplement library were brought together again, and a further 7,000 or so books, especially dictionaries, were gradually acquired by the department. These consisted of books and periodicals dealing with the development of English in Great Britain, America, the Commonwealth, and elsewhere; a large collection of dictionaries (both English and bilingual), volumes on slang, dialect, etymology, and as many of the subject areas treated by the dictionary as it was convenient to house in the editorial offices, besides many of the novels, plays, and collections of published diaries and letters, which had been 'read' for the dictionary's quotation file and were at hand when quotations included in the dictionary needed checking.

By the early 1960s, it was clear that the development of the English language throughout the world had been much more rapid than either the Delegates of the Press or the Editor of the Supplement had at that time considered, and that the Supplement would occupy many more pages than had been originally intended. The paramount importance of reassessing the projected size of the Supplement had been highlighted by the publication in 1961 of Webster's Third New International Dictionary, which illustrated dramatically the proliferation of new vocabulary in North America and Great Britain in the early and mid-twentieth century. Webster's Second had appeared just one year after the earlier OED Supplement, in 1934, and offered a perfect basis for comparison in terms of the rate of change in the language, bringing home sharply to the Editor and his staff the necessity of improving considerably the OED's own coverage of American English, and, pari passu, other overseas varieties of English. The original plans were revised to allow for a Supplement spanning three (and eventually four) volumes, concentrating much more extensively on the vocabulary of North America, the West Indies, Australia, and the other English-speaking countries of the world. The Editor drew a parallel between the current state of affairs on the Supplement and Dryden's remarks in the Preface to the Fables (1700):

> 'Tis with a Poet, as with a Man who designs to build, and is very exact, as he supposes, in casting up the Cost beforehand: But, generally speaking, he is mistaken in his Account, and reckons short of the Expence he first intended: He alters his Mind as the work proceeds, and will have this or that Convenience more, of which he had not thought when he began.[1]

A substantial research base had been built up by the mid-1960s. Besides assistant editors and researchers in Oxford, the Supplement soon had permanent members of staff working as researchers in the major libraries in London and Washington, and links with language centres and with other libraries throughout the world. A panel of specialist consultants was established to read and comment on individual entries in galley proof, and another panel of scholars and writers to read through continuous sections of galley proof with a critical eye. A radical departure from the policy adopted by the editors of the original Dictionary was the appointment from 1968 of graduates in scientific subjects, who took general responsibility for the drafting of entries in these disciplines. The necessity of taking this step had been impressed on the Editor as a result of his visit to the editorial offices of Merriam-Webster in 1967. Editorial work on the Supplement began in earnest in 1964, and the first instalment of copy (A–alpha) was delivered to the University Printer on 27 May 1965. From this point until the completion of the Supplement editorial staff were involved simultaneously in the preparation of copy for press, and in dealing with proofs. At first the University Printer, and subsequently (with considerable overlap) Messrs. William Clowes and Son Ltd., of Colchester, and, in the final stages, Latimer Trend

Ltd., of Plymouth, were engaged in the typesetting of the Supplement.

The first volume of the Supplement (A–G) was published in 1972, and immediately established itself as a worthy sequel to the original Dictionary. Soon after its publication the Editor was honoured with the title of Commander of the British Empire for his services to scholarship. The dictionary was fortunate in attracting the interest of several scholars who began by reviewing the work in the academic press, and then became valuable consultants to the dictionary itself. Gradually more staff were appointed to the work of completing the Supplement, and by the mid-seventies some twenty-five people were involved in one or other editorial task, drafting the initial entries, reviewing the work of assistants, verifying bibliographical information, or conducting essential library research. The second volume (H–N), in which was included a dedication of the whole work to Her Majesty the Queen, appeared in 1976; by this time the editorial offices of the Dictionary were no longer large enough to contain the expanding number of staff, quotations, and research materials necessary for its preparation. Furthermore, the scope of the Dictionary department had expanded under the Chief Editorship of Dr Burchfield to include not simply work on the Supplement, but also the compilation and revision of the other Oxford Dictionaries, and for a time, a number of bilingual dictionaries as well. The department removed, therefore, to more extensive offices in St Giles', Oxford, in 1978; 1982 saw the publication of the third volume (O–Scz); and the Supplement was completed after twenty-nine years of editorial effort with the publication of the final volume in 1986.

Policy

Ian Hay's First Hundred Thousand (1915) contains the observation that 'the Oxford Dictionary of the English Language will have to be revised and enlarged when this war is over'. This fact had not escaped the notice of the Dictionary's editors, and they made ironic use of the quotation as evidence for the use of the adverb when (sense 4b).

The Delegates of the University Press had taken the decision in the 1920s to produce a Supplement which would concentrate on new vocabulary (embracing new words, new meanings of existing words, collocations and combinations, phrases, etc.); as plans were laid for the new Supplement in the 1950s to supersede the 1933 volume, it was again thought that the scope of the work should be restricted primarily to neologisms, thus leaving open the possibility of revising the main dictionary for the future.

Within this context, the principles by which entries for the new Supplement were prepared were inherited in most particulars from the original dictionary: the selection of material was based primarily upon a large quotation file collected as a result of reading an extensive range of sources; the style of definition, along with the critical apparatus (in the form of semantic and syntactic labelling, sense division, etc.) was derived closely from that employed in the parent work. However, although it did concern itself almost exclusively with additions to the language in the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, many antedatings of material in the OED had been collected in the Dictionary's files over the years, and it was decided that, since the work was intended to update the historical record for the modern period in general, the new Supplement should include as many as possible of those antedatings which related to this period (for which 1820 was at first taken as the notional beginning, later 1750). Important though these predatings were, they still represented only a small fraction of the dictionary, which was primarily concerned with new lexical items.

The principal objective of the Supplement was to include all those standard words and senses which were new to the language in Britain since the period of the Dictionary. This objective was soon expanded to include as many of the standard terms from other varieties of English (notably North American English) as could be identified by the reading programme or by other resources. In the event, the broadening of the reading programme to encompass a much greater proportion of the written English of North America, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan, and other regions than had been the case for the OED itself had a profound effect upon the eventual coverage of these areas which the Supplement was able to achieve. In earlier years, Sir William Craigie had advocated the preparation of historical dictionaries treating specific varieties of English around the world. Largely as a result of his pioneering work in this field, a number of scholarly historical dictionaries, such as the Dictionary of American English, the Scottish National Dictionary, and the Dictionary of Canadian English, had been compiled, which assisted the preparation of the Supplement in two ways. First, they provided additional (often very detailed) evidence for items selected for the Supplement; secondly, their existence allowed the Supplement to omit many purely local items, on the grounds that entering them would simply duplicate material that was readily available elsewhere.

The standard vocabulary of British English was already well covered by the existing Dictionary. As well as recent additions to this, and wider coverage of common terms from the other varieties of English, much of the material prepared for the Supplement consisted of the scientific, technical, slang, dialectal, and other words which had passed into common use in the academic or technical fields, or in the social culture or geographical area, to which they belonged. This simply extended the policy of the 1933 Supplement into the age of computing, space technology, popular music, and the other areas of innovation and development by which the second and third quarters of the twentieth century had been characterized. Furthermore, whereas the OED had included nearly all the vocabulary, including hapax legomena, of important medieval and Renaissance authors such as Chaucer, Gower, and Shakespeare, the Supplement followed the more limited policy of presenting liberally, but not exhaustively, the occasional vocabulary of a wide range of major modern authors.

There is sometimes opposition to the appearance in dictionaries of words which are considered either generally offensive or opprobrious to a particular group. The arguments run, on the one hand, that to allow such usages into a dictionary is equivalent to sanctioning their use, and may even bring them to the notice of a wider public than would otherwise have been the case; and on the other hand, that to exclude such items would be tantamount to corrupting the historical record of the language, and would represent the first stage in a process of regulating the dictionary to fit the ethos of the times rather than the facts of the language. After very careful consideration of the matter, it was decided to admit to the Supplement the sexually taboo words formerly thought too gross and vulgar to be given countenance within the covers of a dictionary. This was done long after such vocabulary had been admitted to areas of general literature, and on the understanding that inclusion of these terms in a scholarly dictionary did not necessarily free dictionary editors to add them to dictionaries prepared for other audiences. Two of the most notorious of these terms happened to fall in the alphabetical range covered by the first volume of the Supplement (1972), where they appeared with a wide range of other colloquial and coarse expressions referring to sexual and excretory functions.

A second major area which involved the treatment of potentially offensive vocabulary concerned racial and religious terms. Consideration of this led to the formulation of certain general lexicographical guidelines for the Supplement: namely, that (a) offensiveness to a particular group was inadequate as the only ground for the exclusion of any word or class of words from the OED; (b) it was therefore desirable to enter new racial and religious terms however opprobrious they might seem to those to whom they were applied and often to those who had to use them, or however controversial the set of beliefs professed by the members of such groups; (c) it was also desirable, in order to avoid misunderstanding and consequent hostility, that the antiquated historical records of some words in this category already treated in the OED should be brought up to date.

Similarly, on the question of proprietary terminology, the Supplement endeavoured to follow a policy which safeguarded scholarly standards while not doing anything to imperil the proprietary rights of the owners of such terms. The proprietary status of each term likely to fall into this category was investigated thoroughly in Patent Office records in Britain and America, and elsewhere if this seemed to be necessary. If a term was found to be proprietary this was stated in the definition, and the earliest reference to the application or registration of the name in the official literature was cited as one of the illustrative quotations in the completed entry. It was sometimes found that a proprietary name had passed into general use: this fact was also related in the entry.

The editorial process

A brief description of the various processes involved in the preparation of entries for the first volume of the Supplement (1972) may be found on pp. xvi–xvii of the Introduction to that work. For subsequent volumes a broadly similar method was followed, but as the scope of the work expanded to encompass more diverse material and as the size of the Supplement's staff grew to accommodate this, certain modifications were introduced to ensure that the work was conducted in the most efficient manner. The following account contains a slightly more detailed description of the practices that prevailed at the completion of the Supplement.

i. Collection of material. The raw material serving as a basis for the selection and preparation of entries in the Supplement consisted of the quotations which were collected as a result of a programme of directed reading established in 1957. Many illustrative quotations were also supplied by contributors outside the confines of the reading programme. All quotations were filed alphabetically according to catchword, and were available to staff working on the Supplement, to those working on other departmental projects, and to other interested scholars.

ii. Sorting. In order to establish which entries should be prepared for the Supplement, the entire quotation file was inspected section by section—in the early years by the editor; subsequently by his senior colleagues. Cards illustrating words and meanings selected for inclusion in the Supplement were extracted from the file, and grouped into 'bundles' (each consisting of between thirty and fifty items), ready for drafting. The primary selection was made by comparing the contents of the file with the relevant section of the OED, along with that of the 1933 Supplement which the new Supplement was to supersede. In addition, note was taken of terms not recorded (or sparsely attested) in the quotation file, but which seemed to deserve inclusion in the Supplement on the basis of their appearance in other dictionaries. Cards representing items already covered by the OED, as well as items considered too ephemeral or otherwise irrelevant to the Supplement, and pre-datings from before the modern period, were refiled in a separate sequence for possible later use. 'Bundles' of material were then handed to editorial assistants for drafting.

iii. Drafting. This process involved the preparation of a first draft of a dictionary entry for all of the items in a 'bundle'. Each assistant editor was expected to prepare complete entries, i.e. to ascertain the pronunciation and etymology of each new term where appropriate, to compose a definition, and to select and verify the quotations used. Clearly, the better an entry was prepared at this stage, the less work was needed in revising and editing it later. During this process the material available from the quotation file was augmented by further quotations found in the department's library of dictionaries, concordances, and other reference works. Often it was necessary for additional research work to be done in other libraries, such as the Bodleian Library in Oxford, the British Library in London, the Library of Congress in Washington, and elsewhere, in order to trace earlier and further quotations and to provide more detailed information for the definition. This work was normally conducted by library researchers appointed for the purpose. The library researchers were also responsible for verifying quotations from sources not available in the departmental library. All general items were drafted by non-specialist assistant editors; scientific, natural history, and social science terms were passed to specialist staff for drafting. Dictionary entries were prepared in handwritten form on 6×4 in. slips; a drafted entry would typically consist of head-cards containing the relevant headword, pronunciation and etymology where appropriate, the definition, and other information, followed by other cards bearing the quotations selected to illustrate the entry. When the entries were complete (and all outstanding library research had been returned) they were filed in the main alphabetical sequence of copy in readiness for subsequent review by senior staff.

iv. Revision. In order to allow the Editor to proceed at an efficient pace through the material it was necessary to interpose a revision stage between the initial drafting and the final editing. At first, this involved the incorporation by senior editors of scientific and technical drafting into the main sequence of entries (with concomitant adjustments to sense ordering, etc.), and revising long and complex entries. Subsequently this was extended to the inspection (and, if necessary, revision) of each entry. Quotations recently added to the quotation file were considered, and alterations made to entries in the light of these; occasionally new entries were prepared if the fresh material warranted this.

v. Editing. The final stage of entry preparation was, naturally, the sole responsibility of the Editor. Every entry was inspected minutely, further revisions were carried out, and delicate decisions (as in the treatment of 'sensitive' items, the balance in size between entries from different disciplines, etc.) were made in order to impose an editorial uniformity on the published work.

vi. Bibliographical collation. In the course of drafting, editorial staff endeavoured to ensure that the bibliographical details of works cited were correct. But at this stage it was the task of the bibliographer to establish consistency in respect of the date of publication, 'short title', and other matters. For this purpose an index of verified citation styles, consisting of the majority of the works cited in the Supplement, was maintained throughout the compilation of the work. From it, a bibliography of the works most frequently cited in the Supplement was published at the end of Volume IV.

Bibliographical verification was carried out either on the edited slips or, when publication schedules dictated, on corrected galley proofs.

vii. Proofs and the use of specialist consultants. Copy for the Supplement was sent in regular instalments to the printer, from whom multiple sets of galley proof for each range were received in corresponding instalments for further review.

Up to this point, the entries had been compiled entirely by the departmental staff; at this stage, they were submitted to outside scrutiny. Entries relating to particular disciplines or geographical regions were examined by consultants with specialist knowledge: they were often able to suggest modifications or to supply earlier or more appropriate attestations of the term under consideration. Furthermore, several complete sets of each batch of galley proofs were sent to critical readers for general comments. The improvements suggested by such independent experts were vital in maintaining the standard of Dictionary entries. These comments and suggestions were incorporated by the Editor or by his senior colleagues, along with the routine proof corrections. Quotations which had gathered in the files since the preparation of the copy were inspected, and in the light of them further alterations and additions were made. The corrected galleys were then reviewed by the Editor, and returned to the printer for setting in pages.

One last important process was carried out in page proof: the verification of cross-references. Every cross-reference in the batch of page proofs was checked against its target in the OED, the published volumes of the Supplement, the material in proof, or the manuscript copy. After the second round of page proof, the material was finally passed for press. By the time that the last pages of Volume IV were undergoing these final procedures, the preparation of the second edition of the Oxford English Dictionary had begun.

THE NEW OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY PROJECT

Beginnings

Early in 1982, when the editing of the third and fourth volumes of A Supplement to the Oxford English Dictionary had reached an advanced stage, the Oxford University Press set itself to consider the future of the OED. The two questions of whether any further amplification or revision of the Dictionary should be undertaken, and whether an attempt should be made to combine the main OED with the four volumes of the Supplement, were recognized to be complementary. Publishing a supplement to the Supplement, or adding further material to it, had to be rejected as unsatisfactory expedients. The OED and Supplement should be combined before any further development was possible.

How should this amalgamation be performed? The two portions of the Dictionary had been typeset in hot metal. A new edition, whatever it might entail, would have to be typeset by computer. Conversion of the text into electronic form could be carried out either before or after the amalgamation. The option of creating copy for typesetting from the existing printed texts by means of cutting and pasting, or the marking-up of insertions and deletions, was dismissed. The technology of textual processing by computer was now at a stage of development that made it a highly appropriate tool for the task that OUP contemplated. The OED in machine-readable form, structured for use in a database management system, would be relatively easy to revise and, moreover, would be susceptible of a number of other applications, especially as a publicly available computer database. Indeed, the conversion of the Dictionary into electronic form, for just such a purpose, had already been suggested by parties both inside and outside the Press. It was therefore decided that the data conversion should be the first step taken, not only to lead into and facilitate the amalgamation, and subsequent editing, of the two parts of the Dictionary, but also to open up the possibility of its future development in electronic form.

A preliminary study, carried out by the Oxford English Dictionaries Department in March 1982 under the supervision of Dr R. W. Burchfield, concluded that both the conversion of the texts by manual keyboarding and their integration by experienced editors were feasible;[1] the report also listed the main aspects of the OED which were ripe for revision and correction. The Senior Officers of the Press determined at once to pursue the idea. Since the OED could be regarded as a kind of national monument, it was felt to be quite proper to solicit assistance, whether financial or technical, from Government departments, research institutions, or industrial companies. Accordingly, Mr Richard Charkin, the then Head of Reference Publishing, initiated a large number of approaches in various quarters, and in the meantime assembled the elements of an appeal brochure. By the end of the year the first outlines had emerged of a project that would involve computerizing and merging the two parts of the Dictionary, revising and updating the merged text, and publishing it in both a new printed and an electronic form.

The Identification of Partners

In March 1983 a small team was set up within the Press to begin the planning of the project. Its first task was to write the appeal booklet. It was decided that this should combine two aims. The first part, a clear explanation of the background and purpose of the project, was intended both for general information and more specifically to arouse the interest of any institutions or individuals who might wish to enter into some kind of partnership in the project. The second part, giving detailed technical specifications, was to be used by firms wishing to tender for the work of computerizing and merging the text.

By June, the brochure, entitled A Future for the OED, was complete. Copies were sent to computer companies, data conversion firms, on-line database proprietors, universities, libraries, and the British Government. A deadline of 1 August was set, by which time four firms had submitted tenders. The project team, evaluating these, quickly found that, while each tender had its own particular strengths, none furnished the Press with grounds for confidence that one tenderer, alone, could carry out the entire task to the required standard.

The initial idea had been that the chosen supplier would convert the text into electronic form, merge the OED and Supplement, and supply the resulting computer database to OUP; then, using the text editing system newly installed at OUP, lexicographical staff would revise and correct the Dictionary interactively and pass it on for composition and filmsetting. It now became evident that to carry out integration, to create a fully searchable database system, and to revise the bulk of the text in a single step would be impracticable, and it would be far too long before any new edition of the Dictionary could be published. A revised approach was needed. The project had to be broken down into smaller components; a number of different project partners were required, each responsible for what it could do best; and OUP should act as overall manager of the whole process, co-ordinating the separate components centrally. By the end of 1983, partnerships had been established with three contrasting institutions. These were as yet on an informal basis, but during the succeeding months of joint exploration they rapidly crystallized into formal agreements.

A data conversion firm of great experience and capacity, International Computaprint Corporation (ICC), a subsidiary of Reed International situated in Fort Washington, Pennsylvania, was selected to carry out the conversion of the two texts into electronic form. IBM United Kingdom Ltd. undertook to supply computer hardware and software, and to second a group of experts as the nucleus of a team of system designers: their task would be to build a computer system that would facilitate the integration of the two electronic texts into one. Early in 1984 it was confirmed that this assistance would take the form of a donation under the auspices of IBM's Academic Programme. The University of Waterloo in Ontario, Canada, had expressed great interest in the research aspects of the project as early as 1982. They undertook the task of designing a database system suitable for the dissemination of the OED in electronic form and for the phase of updating and editing which would follow integration. The geographical distribution of this partnership was felt by OUP to symbolize quite suitably the international significance of the OED.

Recognition of the national importance of the project followed soon afterwards. A copy of the brochure had been favourably received by the British Government, and as a result a subvention towards the cost of the lexicographical research was announced by the Department of Trade and Industry in May 1984.

There was one other development of great importance towards the end of 1983. Fifty years before, the remainder of the team responsible for the OED, having completed the original Supplement, dispersed, and there followed an interval of a whole generation during which no original historical lexicography was carried on at OUP. Because of this, the new Supplement had to be started virtually from scratch, and needed many years to make up the lost ground. It was imperative to avoid the repetition of such a hiatus at the completion of the Supplement. Accordingly, a small editorial group who had been engaged in the drafting of entries in Volume IV was set to continue the work of compiling new entries, starting again from A, but also taking in new words and senses anywhere in the alphabet for which entries were clearly needed. This new series of entries was called by the convenient acronym 'NEWS', standing for the 'New English Word Series'. It immediately became a valuable source of information for the other Oxford Dictionaries. Although a complete updating of the Dictionary was now postponed to a second phase of the project, it was decided during 1984 that approximately 5,000 items from this series should be included in the new edition of the OED, in order to compensate for the temporal gap between the earlier and later volumes of the Supplement. The selection and editing of these articles was set in motion, and their text converted to machine-readable form at the end of 1986. This subject is treated more fully in the foregoing Introduction.

[1] The feasibility of using an optical scanner to convert the text of the Dictionary into machine-readable form was also investigated by OUP at this point, as also by others later. It was generally agreed that the complexity of the structure and the irregularity of the type would require an excessively large amount of editorial intervention in the scanning process; and it was not clear how an adequate framework of structural mark-up could be introduced into the text alongside this method of data conversion.

Planning

In January 1984 a department was established within OUP to manage the project. It was now possible to establish the objectives of the project, as follows: the conversion of the Oxford English Dictionary and Supplement to machine-readable form, ensuring that all information contained in the one form was carried over into the other; the integration of the two texts into one; the addition of articles on a selection of new words and senses; and the publication of the integrated version of the Dictionary within an acceptable time. These objectives constituted the first phase of the New Oxford English Dictionary Project. The revision, updating, and enhancement of the Dictionary (of which more is said below) would be the business of a subsequent phase.

Detailed planning was essential to the attainment of these objectives. An overall plan (known as the 'Plan of Record') was drawn up that identified all the major activities within the project, their interrelationships, the time each would take, and the resources of staff, equipment, and finance each required. These were: conversion of the data (or 'data capture'), initial proof-reading, computer development, automatic processing of the machine-readable text, editing of entries on the screen, composition of galley proofs, final proof-reading, and final page composition. For each of these a detailed plan was made. In July 1985, when the outline design of the computer system was complete, it became possible to estimate the times required by the process of building and using that system; these times were added into the plan, and a firm Plan of Record was established. Thereafter, the target dates for the completion of each main activity were fixed.

Proprietary software designed for project planning and spreadsheet operations was of vital help in developing and monitoring each of the interlocking detailed plans which made up the overall Plan of Record. This computer assistance immediately revealed the effects on that plan of changing any value (number of staff, amount of time, or cost). Hence it was possible to project time and cost quite accurately and to monitor progress against these projections. The use of such technically sophisticated methods, more redolent of engineering than lexicography, and unprecedented in the history of the Oxford Dictionaries, was necessitated by the scope and scale of the project. The latter may be roughly illustrated by some figures for the resources used in each main activity. Data capture, the keying of about 350,000,000 characters over 18 months, took 120 person-years; computer development took 14 person-years; automatic processing of the text took 10 months; interactive integration took 7 person-years; the two rounds of proof-reading, undertaken by over 50 people, each took 60 person-years; and final composition of the integrated text involved the setting of approximately 20,000,000 characters per week. The adoption of rigorous planning and adherence to strict monitoring of progress contributed significantly to the work's completion in full accordance with the schedule and expenditure forecast which had been established four years previously.

Data structure

Once firm plans had been made, it was intended that the conversion of the text into electronic form should begin as soon as possible. Preparations at ICC were by now well advanced. But for data capture to begin, a system for structuring the text had to be agreed upon. It was resolved that the tagging language inserted into the electronic version should do more than simply express the typographical features—layout, typeface, type size, font—of the printed text. It must, as its primary function, identify the structural elements which combine to form a dictionary entry. This was a prerequisite both for the development of the database in the future, and, as it turned out, for the automatic processes applied to the text in the course of integration.

Several months were devoted to the analysis of the structure of the OED and its Supplement, resulting in an inventory of the most important structural elements (amounting to between forty and fifty) and their current typographical realizations. The translation of this scheme into a system of tags, though not without its difficulties, was straightforward compared to the immense task of ensuring that each element of Dictionary text was supplied with the correct tag. It emerged from discussions with ICC that a tagging scheme of such size and complexity would be very hard to insert accurately into the text at the stage of initial data capture. It would require so much knowledge that the training of keyboarders would be very long and the typing very slow. It would also require extensive pre-editing of the text, which again would take an excessively long time and require much training. On the other hand, a more modest scheme would be manageable. Accordingly, a compromise mark-up scheme was devised. The fifteen or so most prominent textual elements received tags with structural meaning, while all other features of the text were coded with tags that had a conventional typographical meaning. Further coding was deferred to a later stage. Even with this scheme, ICC found it necessary to carry out a considerable amount of preliminary mark-up, conduct lengthy training sessions, and undertake several proof-reading cycles, before the text was ready to be shipped to Oxford.

On 15 May 1984, at a press conference in the premises of the Royal Society in London, a formal announcement of the launching of the New Oxford English Dictionary Project was made, including the news that IBM UK Ltd. would be making a substantial donation to the first phase of the project. Meanwhile, work on the means of carrying out the integration of the text was continuing in collaboration with IBM. Matters needing development were identified as: the database management system for holding and protecting the electronic text, the software tool by which it might be edited, and a means of correcting cross-references affected by integration. There was also the problem of enhancing the system of tagging introduced by ICC so that it should be an entirely 'generalized' mark-up language, that is to say, one having structural, not typographical, signification. At first this planning was conducted by means of a regular meeting between staff from OUP and IBM, but at length, in mid-July, the first secondee from IBM arrived at OUP as the project's computer group manager, and began to build up his team. From then on, the main instrument by which progress was monitored and problems were identified was a formal system of meetings, some at half-yearly and monthly intervals, at which representatives of the management of IBM were present, others occurring weekly and dealing with the minutiae of the project team's work.

During the following autumn the project gathered momentum. In September the University of Waterloo was granted Canadian Government funding with which to establish a Centre for the New OED as a focus for database research, from the point of view of both the academic user and the computer scientist. Early sketches of a potential database structure had already been made, and, more importantly, the project had attracted the interest of several researchers who might be able to provide parsing software which would facilitate the enhancement of the mark-up language. After some months of experimentation at the University of Waterloo, work was begun on this part of the system by the project's computer group, a vital contribution at the start being made by a secondee from Waterloo.

Also in September 1984, ICC sent to Oxford test data consisting of 100 pages of Dictionary text on magnetic tape. This not only proved the feasibility of the scheme for data capture but also made it possible to try out methods of proof-reading.

In October the project team drew up a formal Statement of User Requirements, which set out the aims of the first phase and the operations which the computer system would be required to perform. This gave the computer group a basis on which to develop their detailed design of the system, an activity which occupied their attention over the two succeeding years. An Editorial Board was constituted, consisting of about forty scholars in a wide range of disciplines; the idea being that they should give advice to the project team especially when the revision, updating, and enhancement of the dictionary were planned.

Data Capture

At the beginning of November 1984 the computer equipment from IBM was installed. At the same time, ICC began data capture in earnest. A team of ICC copy editors, based in Fort Washington, Pennsylvania, began to insert structural mark-up on enlarged copies of the Dictionary pages. These were passed to the data conversion personnel (both on the same site and in Tampa, Florida) for keyboarding. Data-validation routines and sample proof-reading were carried out by ICC before the proofs were shipped to Oxford. It was stipulated that the rate of errors should be no more than 7 in 10,000 keystrokes; and this requirement was met.

The first batch of magnetic tapes and proofs arrived in January 1985, and proof-reading immediately got under way. From then until June 1986 a regular cycle of data capture, proof-reading, and data correction was maintained. A team of some fifty freelance proof-readers was directed from Oxford. They were required to check not only the accuracy of the text but also the selection and positioning of the computer codes. They were provided with a detailed manual describing the structure of the Dictionary and the correct application of the tagging system. Double proof-reading—the reading of the same section of text by two people independently, followed by cross-collation—was employed for a trial period. It proved, owing mainly to the very low error rate maintained by ICC, not to reveal a markedly higher number of errors than a single reading; certainly not enough to justify the double outlay of expense and editorial effort. A single reading was therefore conducted, but experienced staff checked, emended, and supplemented all the corrections before the proofs were returned to ICC. In addition, a system of monitoring the proof-readers' work by detailed rechecking of random samples was carried out until satisfactory standards had been achieved. During the same stage, a prototype of the parsing program was run on most of the electronic text to validate its structure: this functioned rather like an additional (and, within certain limits, infallible) proof-reader.

When ICC returned the corrected tapes, these were subjected to a further check, on the screen, to ensure that the corrections had been carried out within the agreed margins. This left the text with an estimated residual error-rate of only 1 in 235,000 characters. Since most of these were minor errors of punctuation and spacing, and the text would subsequently be proof-read a second time, this was felt to be an acceptable level at which the data could proceed to automatic processing by computer.

Computer Development

In July 1985 the computer group issued an Outline System Design, describing the essential components and features of the New OED computer system. Over the following eighteen months, in close consultation with the lexicographers, the group built a unique dictionary system tailored to the special needs of the project.

Once the text had been captured, it was loaded on to the project's IBM 4341 mainframe at OUP. It was important that it should be stored in a database system that would allow the necessary access and processing facilities. The operating system used was IBM's VM 370; the database management system was SQL/DS. Every new version of the data created by each successive stage of processing and editing was retained in the database; no older version was overwritten, and the whole was regularly archived on to magnetic tape and stored at a remote site for safety.

The structure devised by Sir James Murray and used by him and all his successors for writing Dictionary entries was so regular that it was possible to analyse them as if they were sentences of a language with a definite syntax and grammar. They could therefore be parsed, and this was the next process to which the text was submitted. The objective of parsing, as already mentioned, was to transform the text into a version categorized by a system of generalized mark-up, known as SGML (Standard Generalized Mark-up Language), in which each element is identified by its function, not its printed appearance. The programs used for parsing were written by staff of the University of Waterloo. The 'grammar' of the Dictionary text with which they operated was written at Oxford. It was developed by running a postulated grammar against the Dictionary text to establish whether the latter could be transformed without rejection of the input or ambiguity in the output. Revised versions of the grammar were run repeatedly until the closest possible approximation was achieved. The grammar had to be descriptive, not prescriptive, since the computer could not be allowed to override lexicographical judgement, and only the most minor rewriting of the text to accommodate computerization was acceptable.

A particularly important proposal in the outline design was that the computer system should automatically carry out as much as possible of the integration of corresponding OED and Supplement entries, leaving the lexicographical team the task of correcting errors, harmonizing adjacent text, and coping with difficult cases. The integration routines used the mark-up to create a single sequence of text from the two component parts, following the main structural cues (headwords and sense divisions) and the instructions in the Supplement that were identified as 'integration instructions' during parsing. Subsequent analysis of the integration program's performance showed that it successfully handled about 80 per cent of the text, and spared the lexicographers and keyboarders between 50 per cent and 60 per cent of the number of tasks which they would otherwise have been obliged to perform interactively at the computer screen.

Integration caused the targets of thousands of cross-references to be changed, rendering the cross-references inaccurate. To cope with this problem, every cross-reference identified by the parser was numbered and copied; after integration, the stored copies were automatically matched with their targets, changed wherever necessary, and returned to the text. In a similar way the pronunciations were copied, translated into the International Phonetic Alphabet, and restored.

The problem arose of finding editorial software suitable for emending and integrating entries interactively at the computer terminal. Failing to discover any proprietary software that was adequate, the team resolved to develop its own. The product of this development was a new kind of text editor, designed for structured text, and originally known as LEXX. The initial work was carried out by an IBM secondee, and then taken over and extended by the OUP staff. This highly versatile editorial tool was designed to interface with a number of programs that controlled access to the Dictionary data held on the computer, allowed entries to be proofed for immediate checking, and provided a complete working environment with checks and controls to protect the integrity of the text. The combined sub-system was eventually named the OED Integration, Proofing, and Updating System (OEDIPUS).

Once editing was complete, the text was to be transferred for composition of galley and page proofs. It was decided that this part of the process should be performed by an outside supplier.

During 1986 data capture of the main OED and Supplement text was completed (the remaining text—the entirely new entries and the bibliography—was keyboarded during the following half-year). The last of the eighteen monthly batches of proofs was returned, corrected, to ICC in mid-August. A month later the automatic processing of the Dictionary data on the computer system began. First the text was read on to the system and validated. Next the parser was run. Structural errors encountered by the parser were corrected on-line by the editorial group. During the three months that elapsed, 5,711 corrections were made. Automatic integration itself began in March 1987, and the automatic processing of the whole text of the Dictionary was completed at the end of May.

The Editing of the Integrated Text

After subjecting OEDIPUS to acceptance trials, the editorial group was given access to the system at the end of June 1987. The most efficient working method had already been determined by experimentation. Proofs, or more strictly speaking, printouts, of all entries that were subject to integration and the modifications resulting from it were run off by the computer system. The lexicographical group would work through these, examining the results of automatic integration and making corrections and other emendations. These alterations would be entered into the text on-line by a separate group of keyboarders. Galley proofs of the complete integrated text would then be produced by an outside supplier. Accordingly, editing of the printouts began in June, and, at the same time, a team of keyboard operators was engaged, trained, and assigned to the task of 'interactive integration'.

After the first few months, during which no galley proofs were composed, the editorial group found itself occupied on several fronts simultaneously. On account of its huge size, the text was handled by the computer in forty alphabetical ranges or 'tables'. At any one time, the group would be editing up to half a dozen text tables. Each of these would be undergoing one of four consecutive editorial processes. The first was the editing by lexicographers of proofs of all entries that had in any way been modified by the integration and cross-referencing programs. Next, these marked-up proofs were passed to the keyboard operators, who made the necessary emendations to the electronic text. At this stage, a number of other corrections had also to be made, some unconnected with the action of integration; also, many complicated problems of integration came to light (including entries that had wrongly eluded automatic integration) and had to be resolved, at the keyboard, by the lexicographical staff. Once the integration of a table had been approved, a magnetic tape was produced and sent to the composition suppliers, Filmtype Services Ltd., of Scarborough, North Yorkshire.

Galley proofs of the entire Dictionary text for each text table were produced and distributed to the team of proof-readers (now increased to more than sixty). On their return, the third stage began. The editorial group checked all proof-readers' corrections, and carried out many additional systematic checks, some facilitated by specific computer scans. Cross-references were dealt with at this stage. Once approved, the table was again put on tape and sent for composition. This time fully formatted page proofs were produced, and the breaks between volumes were inserted. The fourth stage consisted of the checking of these proofs to ensure that all galley proof corrections appeared correctly on them, and that no errors had crept into the text for any other reason, such as malfunctioning of the composition programs. The final corrections to the page proofs were again keyboarded into the database at Oxford; they were applied to the printed version by Filmtype Services either by the processing of a new magnetic tape copy or by simple keyboarding. When the final proof pages for a volume were deemed acceptable, the volume was passed for press.

Editorial Processes

During the course of the project, the text of the Dictionary was emended in numerous ways, over and above the central activity of integrating the matter from the Supplement into the main OED. Many classes of change were logically necessitated by integration; others, notably the adoption of the International Phonetic Alphabet and the addition of new words, were undertaken in order to increase the usefulness of the Dictionary. These alterations (a detailed explanation of which is given in the foregoing Introduction) were made during the three main stages by which the new edition was produced: initial data capture, automatic text processing, and interactive editing.

During initial data capture the chief amendments to the text were: the provision of transliteration for foreign script where the source text lacked it; the resolution of hyphenation problems; research on quotations with questionable text or imperfect citations; and the regularization of individual aberrantly structured entries. Before automatic text processing began, every main headword and bold subordinate headword in the OED that required an initial capital was marked by editorial staff and this information keyed into the computer, enabling the text and cross-references to be automatically emended. The system itself automatically carried out the conversion of the ICC tagging system to the generalized mark-up language; the translation of the Murray phonetic symbols and stress-marks into their IPA equivalents; the addition of a part of speech or homonym number to headwords no longer unique after integration; and the adjustment of cross-reference details affected by integration. The correction (by editors at the screen) of irregularities encountered by the parser was made at this stage, but corrections to capitalization, cross-references, and the phonetic transcriptions were made during the third stage. Many problems with the five hundred or so rarely occurring special characters, detected in the middle stage, were dealt with then too.

During the stage of interactive integration, galley-proof reading, and correction checking, the lexicographical group was notably assisted by a wide range of computer searches, the results of which were furnished on printed reports which could be tailored into formats of maximum usefulness. Among other matters, these reports covered unresolved cross-references, erroneous or ambiguous phonetic transcriptions, italicized phrases with initial capital letters, stray pronunciations that had not been converted to IPA, and entries with abnormal sense orders and structures. In addition, it was at this stage that the editorial group entered the addenda and spurious entries from Volume XII of the OED; the corrections which had been prepared for Volumes I and II of the Supplement but not inserted in them; and a host of minor corrections assembled on slips before and during the previous stages of the project. The entries for the twenty-six letters of the alphabet, and for certain similar two-letter groups, were also given special attention at this stage, as were many main entries from the Supplement which, for completeness' sake, required the transfer of portions of text from other (originally OED) entries. It may be said without exaggeration that the apparently straightforward task of amalgamating the two texts turned out to have ramifications and implications so multifarious, protean, and unpredictable that the project team occasionally despaired of detecting them all; and it is also freely acknowledged that resources sometimes did not permit them to carry out changes prescribed in the Supplement to quite the extent or degree implied by the latter. No effort was spared, however, in the attempt to carry out faithfully both the overt instructions and the implied purport of every one of the 69,372 entries in the Supplement.

The Future of the OED

It was recognized at the start of the project that no enhancements of the Dictionary could be carried out before the texts of the Supplement and the first edition of the OED had been combined. This amalgamation has been achieved, and the OED now exists in a second edition. But the English language continues to develop, the requirements of lexicography continue to change, and, accordingly, work on the OED continues too. The most important way in which the OED can be updated is by the addition of new words and senses, and this task is well in hand. Already 5,000 new items have been added to the second edition, and these can be regarded as an earnest of many more that are in the course of compilation. It has become very clear to the editors of this edition that virtually no new item can be added to the Dictionary without repercussions upon the entries already there. Purely as a result of integration, therefore, many changes have been made to the text which fall into the category of revision. Then, outside this sphere, the most important global revision of the text—the replacement of Murray's phonetic transcription with IPA—has already been achieved (though it could helpfully be extended, for example by the coverage of non-RP varieties). In short, the revision and updating of the OED is already well under way.

Much, however, remains to be done. Indeed some parts of the task could never be completed once for all, but that should be no deterrent from making a start. There is much in the style of the Dictionary, the punctuation, the capitalization, the definitional terminology, and the spelling (within entries and even of some headwords) that calls for modernization. In the cross-reference system, many improvements are desirable, notably in the citation of variant spellings as headwords and in the more precise specification of parts of speech, homonym numbers, and sense numbers. In the etymologies, the varying systems of transcription should be harmonized, the linguistic nomenclature should be brought up to date, and the results of recent research should be added. The organization of senses within many entries needs to be rethought. Numerous scientific and technical definitions need to be brought into line with present-day knowledge (though the Supplement amended the treatment of many of the most important terms). Many of the definitions of general vocabulary need to be reworked to take account of recent technological and social changes. There are a number of references to countries, currency values, institutions, and persons, which are now anachronistic; and there are still a few definitions which enshrine social attitudes that are now alien. The usage and subject labels should be made fully consistent and modernized.

Many current words are illustrated by a latest quotation from the first half of the nineteenth century, or even earlier, and it is difficult to distinguish them from words or senses that are now, in fact, disused. Recent examples ought to be supplied for every sense that is still current. The citation style of many quotations from the original OED could well be brought up to the standard of consistency of the Supplement (although improving it would require the rechecking of many thousands of quotations). Earlier examples exist (in various places) for thousands of words and senses, and these should be added. The coverage of English before 1700, and at least as far back as 1500, could be markedly improved. Last, but certainly not least, the coverage of English outside the United Kingdom needs to be greatly expanded, especially the English of North America, which is the greatest source of linguistic change, but not neglecting the English of the many other parts of the world where it is a first or important second language.

Other improvements could be mentioned, but these are the principal aspects of the OED on which there is work to be done, as most regular users of the Dictionary will recognize, however greatly they admire it. To these improvements the New OED project team hope to address their efforts in the coming years, so that the Oxford English Dictionary may continue to be an accurate and comprehensive register of the whole vocabulary of English.

THE FIRST EDITION: STAFF AND CONTRIBUTORS

1. Contributors

A. This list contains the names of the principal readers before 1884; many of these began reading as early as 1858. The material which they contributed formed a great part of the main foundation on which the Dictionary was based. Under some of the names the number of quotations sent in is given, as an indication of the time and labour expended by many of these readers.

2. Sub-editors

The sub-editing of the material falls into two periods, viz. that done under the direction of Dr Furnivall between 1862 and 1879, and that carried on during the years while the Dictionary was in course of publication. The following list gives the sub-editors of the later period, but it should be noted that some of these (e.g. H. H. Gibbs, W. M. Rossetti, Revd T. H. Sheppard, Revd J. Smallpeice) were also at work during the earlier years. For the earlier period mention should further be made of Revd W. P. Bailey, Revd S. J. Bowles, Edward Dowen, W. Gee, jun. (of Boston, USA), W. F. Grahame, J. D. Howell, Revd Aiken Irvine, E. S. Jackson, Revd E. H. Knowles, Revd J. E. Middleton, Richard Morris, Horace Moule, Revd A. S. Palmer, Revd Ralph Proud, C. W. Staunton, Dr W. Woodham Webb, Revd G. Wheelwright, G. A. White, Miss Charlotte M. Yonge. Most of these were also readers in the early history of the Dictionary.

3. Assistants

The names of these are here divided into three groups, indicative of the relative length of time during which they were engaged on the work. As will be seen from the dates given, those included in the first group were for many years members of their respective staffs, and by their knowledge and experience contributed immensely to the progress of the work. The staff to which each was attached is indicated by the initial letter of the editor's name (M. = Murray; etc.).

John Mitchell (1883–94; M.)
Walter Worrall, BA (1885–1933; M., B., O.)
A. T. Maling, MA (1886–1927; M., O.)
C. G. Balk (1885–1913; M.)
G. F. H. Sykes, BA (1885–1903; M., B.)
W. J. Lewis (1889–1933; B., O.)
F. J. Sweatman, MA (1890–1933; M., O.)
H. J. Bayliss (1891–1932; B., C.)
C. T. Onions, MA, D.Litt. (1895–1914; M., B.; 1914–Editor)

4. Proof Readers

The following lists give the names of those who, outside of the regular staffs, rendered valuable help by regularly reading the proofs and making suggestions and additions. Those in the first list continued this important service for many years, in some cases from the beginning, and in all cases down to the year of their death or to the completion of the work.

Dr Fitzedward Hall († 1901)
H. Hucks Gibbs (Lord Aldenham) († 1907)
Revd J. B. Johnston, BD
Revd J. T. Fowler, DCL († 1924)
Miss Edith Thompson († 1929) and Miss E. Perronet Thompson
R. J. Whitwell, B. Litt. († 1928)
Dr W. Sykes († 1906)
F. J. Amours († 1910)
A. Caland († 1910).

Prof. F. E. Bumby
G. R. Carline
Dr G. F. S. Friedrichsen
H. Chichester Hart
W. W. Jenkinson
Dr G. Ch. van Langenhove
Revd J. A. Milne
Russell Martineau, MA
Revd C. B. Mount, MA
L. Pearsall Smith, MA
H. F. Rutter, M.Inst. C.E.
Prof. W. W. Skeat
W. H. Stevenson, MA
Revd W. B. R. Wilson, MA

5. Other Helpers

It would require several pages to give even a partial list of those who contributed separate items of information, either of their own accord or in reply to queries addressed to them. Special mention, however, should be made of a few authorities who, especially in the earlier years of the work, freely gave the editors the benefit of their special knowledge in their respective fields, e.g. Prof. Paul Meyer in Romanic Philology, Prof. E. Sievers in Germanic, Profs. W. W. Skeat and A. Napier in English, Prof. Sir John Rhŷs in Celtic, Sir Frederick Pollock in Law, and Prof. F. W. Maitland in History. For many years Mr James Platt supplied most of the material for the etymology of words from remote languages, with the dictionaries of which he had an unrivalled acquaintance.

Valuable service was also rendered by a succession of voluntary workers who verified doubtful quotations or references, and searched for special information, at the British Museum; prominent among these were Mr E. L. Brandreth, down to his death in 1907, his immediate successor in the field, Mr W. W. Jenkinson, and Mr R. J. Whitwell, who also did verification and research in the Public Record Office and for many years contributed much material of special value.

While similar verification and research in the Bodleian Library was done by several of the regular members of the Dictionary staffs, their work was greatly aided by the generous co-operation of the Librarian and staff of that institution, on which the constant demand for the requisite books has imposed a heavy burden for many years. The share of 'Bodley' in furthering the progress, and increasing the value, of the Dictionary is one that deserves to be gratefully remembered, and adds one more reason to those which have given the name of 'Oxford' to a work that can no longer be described as 'New'.

KEY TO THE CONVENTIONS OF THE DICTIONARY

Abbreviations

For a list of abbreviations used in the Dictionary, see p. lxvi.

Abbreviations may be entered in the Dictionary either as main words:

> ABTA, Abta ('æbtə). [Acronym f. the initial letters of the association.] The Association of British Travel Agents, established in 1950.
>
> 1950 Travel Topics Nov. 64/1 We can even hope that one day..membership of the A.B.T.A. will be accepted as sufficient evidence by the operating companies. 1963 Times 11 Jan. 6/5 The council of the Abta (the Association of British Travel Agents) in effect warned its members not to sell the scheme to the public, on the grounds that it contravened the association's code of conduct. 1981 Economist 24 Jan. 78/3 Competing operators argue that the customer gets less protection, since Travel Bazaar's four shops do not belong to the Association of British Travel Agents (Abta). 1984 Daily Tel. 12 Mar. 3/3 ABTA..is asking members to point out the dangers to tourists.

or in the final section of the entry for the corresponding initial letter, as at A III:

> ASL, American Sign Language; A.S.M., air-to-surface missile; A.S.M., assistant stage-manager; A/S.R.S., Air-Sea Rescue Service; A.S.T.M.S. (also with pronunc. 'æstəmz), Association of Scientific, Technical, and Managerial Staffs; A.S.V., air(craft) to surface vessel; A.T.A., Air Transport Auxiliary;

Alphabetical order

The alphabetical order of the main entries in the Dictionary is strictly letter-by-letter, i.e. ignoring capitalization, punctuation, and spaces between words:

> Athoan
> athodyd
> at-hold > Athole brose
> at home, at-home
> -athon

Note that headwords in which a final letter is bracketed with an opening bracket only appear where they would if the letter(s) after the bracket were not there:

> air
> air(e
> airable

whereas those with both opening and closing brackets appear where they would if the brackets were not present:

> amarant(h)ine
> amarant(h)oid
> amarantite

Where two words are identical in spelling, they are differentiated by part of speech:

> aid (eɪd), v.

If two words of the same part of speech have distinct etymologies, they are differentiated by superior numbers:

> †aire, sb.[1] Obs.; also 6 aare. [a. OFr. aire:—L. āra altar.] An altar.
>
> †aire, sb.[2] Obs. Forms: 4 air, 5 eyre, 7 ayre, 4–7 aire. [a. OFr. aire: see AERIE.] The earlier equivalent of AERIE.

Combinations

Combinations of words, and compound words, may be entered in their normal alphabetical sequence as main words:

> 'air-ˌchamber. [AIR- 7.]
>
> 1. a. Any chamber or cavity filled with air in an animal or plant, esp. those in a 'chambered-shell.'
>
> 1847 ANSTED Anc. World iii. 43 In the Nautilus .. we find a large, powerful, and complicated shell, composed of a number of separate compartments or air-chambers. 1855 OWEN Vertebr. I. ii. (L.) These air-chambers between the outer table and the immediate covering of the brain.
>
> b. A chamber filled with air in a boat, airship, etc., to provide or assist buoyancy.
>
> 1881 W. D. HAY 300 Years Hence vii. 133 In the upper part [of the boat] was the entrance and air-chamber. 1882 Encycl. Brit. XIV. 570/2 The buoyancy of the institution's lifeboat .. is secured chiefly by means of a watertight deck .. and two large air-chambers, one in the bow, the other in the stern. 1908 H. G. WELLS War in Air viii. § 1 The airship was remarkably simple to construct: given the air-chamber material, the engines, [etc.]..it was really not more complicated..than an ordinary wooden boat had been.. before.
>
> 2. In a pump or other hydraulic machine, a receptacle containing air, the elasticity of which, when condensed, maintains a constant pressure upon the water; an air-vessel.
>
> 1873 ATKINSON tr. Ganot's Physics § 206 The fire engine is a force pump in which a steady jet is obtained by the aid of an air-chamber.
>
> 'air-ˌchambered, a. [f. prec. + -ED.] Furnished with air-chambers.
>
> 1856 KANE Arct. Explor. I. v. 49 It [boat] was air-chambered and buoyant.

If they are less complex, they are normally entered in the concluding section of the entry for the first word, as at AID:

> 8. Comb. and attrib., chiefly in sense 7, as aid-band, -cohort, -force, -soldier; or in sense 5, as aid-money: (all obs.). Also aid-major obs. an adjutant; aid-post, a post at which wounded soldiers receive first medical attention; aid-prayer in Law: see 2.

or under the combining form which is their first element, as at AERO-:

> ˌaerotherà'peutics (Syd. Soc. Lex., 1881), -'therapy = PNEUMATOTHERAPEUTICS; ae'rotropism Bot. [ad. G. aërotropismus (H. Molisch 1885, in Wiener Akad. Sitzungsber. XC. I. 137), f. Gr. τροπή turning (τρέπειν to turn): see -ISM], the property, exhibited esp. by the growing roots of plants, of bending or turning towards a source of air; hence aero'tropic a.

Cross-references

Cross-reference to another main word (or derivative) is made in small Roman capitals:

> 'air-balloon. [AIR- 7.] †1. = BALLOON sb.[1] 3. Obs.
>
> 1753 Publ. Advertiser 25 May, A cascade, and shower of fire, and grand air-balloons, were most magnificently displayed.
>
> 2. A globose bag filled with gas so as to ascend in the air. cf. BALLOON sb.[1] 6.
>
> 1783 [see BALLOON sb.[1] 6]. 1783 Morning Chron. 8 Sept. 3/4 The first air-balloon he made was filled with fumous particles. 1784 JOHNSON in Boswell III. 626 On one day I, [etc.]

Where the entry referred to is for a proper noun, the cross-reference appears in small capitals with a full capital initial:

‖ bengaline ('bɛŋgəli:n). [mod.F.; so called from similarity to the fabric mentioned under BENGAL 1.] A (French) name for poplin, a mixed fabric of silk and worsted.

1884 Pall Mall G. 20 Sept. 4/1 Autumn Fashions, Bengaline (a superior substitute for Irish poplin).

Cross-reference to a phrase or word combination in another entry is made in italic type:

A.C.V., air-cushion vehicle (see air-cushion (b) s.v. AIR sb.[1] B. II); A.C.W., aircraftwoman; A.D.C., aide-de-camp;

Some cross-references mix italic and small capitals; in these, the word in small capitals indicates the entry in which the phrase will be found:

‖ absurdum (æb'sɜ:dəm). [L. neuter of absurdus adj., used substantively as a scholastic term in med.L.] An absurd or illogical conclusion or condition. See REDUCTIO ad absurdum.

a 1834 LAMB Spec. fr. Fuller 537 note, Setting up an absurdum on purpose to hunt it down. 1877 KINGLAKE Crimea (ed. 6) I. xv. 342 Reducing the theory of Representative Government to the absurdum.

Cross-reference entries are entered in the same alphabetical sequence as other main words:

absychitical, erroneous form of APSYCHICAL.

ahwene, variant of AWHENE v. Obs., to vex.

ai, aie, obs. forms of AY, AYE, and of EGG.

Derivatives

Derivatives of the main word may be treated as main words in their own right, or be placed in a section at the end of the entry for the word on which they are formed, introduced by 'Hence', 'Also', or 'So':

aeronautic (ˌeɪərəʊ'nɔ:tɪk, ˌɛərəʊ-), a. [f. prec. + -IC; cf. Gr. ναυτικ-ός pertaining to sailing.] Of or pertaining to aeronauts, or to aerial navigation; sailing the air.

1784 Hibernian Mag. Sept. 489/2, I shall..attempt a description of his [sc. Richard Crosbie's] Aeronautic Chariot. 1826 Miss MITFORD Our Village Ser. II. (1863) 402 The announcement of the aeronautic expedition drew at least ten thousand gazers into the good town. 1876 M. COLLINS Blacksm. & Scholar I. viii. 197 The aeronautic art will not be perfected until the flight of birds is more carefully studied. 1878 Daily News 24 Oct. 6/4 The threads of the gossamer or aeronautic spider may be now seen. 1908 H. G. WELLS War in Air iv. §1 The Emperor forgave him and placed him in control of the new aeronautic arm of the German forces. Ibid. xi. §2 None of these countries had prepared for aeronautic warfare on the magnificent scale of the Germans. 1918 E. S. FARROW Dict. Mil. Terms 9 Aëronautic Maps, maps showing the contours and configuration of the land as closely as possible to the way it looks to the aviator from the air.

Hence ˌaero'nautica sb. pl. [mod.L., see AERONAUTICS], matters or facts of aeronautics.

1753 [see AERONAUTICS]. 1838 T. M. MASON (title) Aeronautica. 1883 Catal. Pat. Off. Libr. II. 4 (title) Aëronautica Illustrata. A complete Cabinet of Aërial Ascents and Descents from the earliest period.

In some cases, the main word and derivative(s) are treated together:

asynapsis (æ-, eɪsɪ'næpsɪs). Biol. [f. A- pref. 14 + SYNAPSIS.] Absence of synapsis; failure of chromosomes to pair in meiosis. Hence asy'naptic a.

1930 G. W. BEADLE in Cornell Univ. Agr. Exp. Sta. Mem. CXXIX. (title) Genetical and Cytological Studies of Mendelian Asynapsis in Zea mays. 1937 C. D. DARLINGTON Rec. Adv. Cytol. (ed. 2) vii. 291 In 'asynaptic' maize which has as a rule no pairing of chromosomes at meiosis, the progeny nevertheless show the results of normal crossing-over. 1949 DARLINGTON & MATHER Elem. Genetics v. 110 A so-called asynaptic gene often.. produces a general reduction in the crossing-over of all the chromosome pairs when homozygous.

Division into senses

Large Roman capital letters are used principally for division of an entry into different parts of speech:

annelid(e ('ænəlɪd), sb. and a. Zool. [a. mod.Fr. annélide, f. as next: see -ID.]

A. sb. A member of the division of Annelida; a red-blooded worm.

1834 Sir C. BELL, Hand 263 These annelides can creep and turn in every direction. 1857 WOOD Obj. Sea-shore 94 The commonest of the terrestrial annelids is the earth-worm.

B. adj. Of or pertaining to the Annelida.

1855 KINGSLEY Glaucus (1878) 113 Long Annelid worms of quaintest forms and colours. 1865 BRISTOW Figuier's World bef. Del. iv, [No] indications of life, except annelide-tracks, and burrows.

Large Roman capital numerals are used to indicate the 'branches' or main historical divisions of the sense development: see General Explanations, p. xxix. The distinct senses of a word are numbered 1, 2, 3, etc.; each of these senses may be further subdivided a, b, c, etc., and a further subdivision (a), (b), (c), or (i), (ii), (iii), etc. is also possible: for further explanation, see p. xxxiii.

Etymology

The etymology and form history are introduced by bold square brackets. In the main entry, these are placed after the variant forms:

annates ('æneɪts, -əts). Also 6 annatys, 6–8 annats. [a. Fr. annate (15th c.), ad. med. and late L. annāta a year's space, work, proceeds, the same word which in its primary sense became in Fr. année. See -ATA.].

Etymologies, or etymological information, may also occur in other places within an entry, still enclosed in square brackets:

airbrasive a. and sb. [(A)BRASIVE a.] Dentistry (see quots.); air-break, (a) [BREAK sb.[1] 5] Cricket, a 'twist' or deviation in the air, of the ball when bowled; (b) [BREAK sb.[1] 17 b] Electr. Engin., attrib. (see quot. 1910);

Labels

Labels normally appear in italic type, and are used to indicate the status or usage of a word or sense. Usage labels include indications of register (colloq., slang), geographical area (U.S., Austral.), or subject specialization (Law, Linguistics). For further explanation, see p. xxvii.

The part of speech, or grammatical category of a word, is normally given in italic type after the headword or subordinate word(s):

anneal (ə'ni:l), v. Forms: 1 onælan (anælan), 2

air-dammed a., furnished with an air dam;

Where the subordinate words are given in bold italic type, the part of speech may follow in Roman:

air-dried a., dried by the action of the air; so air-dry v. trans.; air-driven a., actuated by means of compressed air;

Where no part of speech is given, the entry is for a noun (substantive).

Pronunciation

The pronunciation, transcribed according to the International Phonetic Alphabet, is enclosed in round brackets:

> aerobic (ɛə'rəʊbɪk), a. [f. AEROBE + -IC.]
>
> ‖ aide-de-camp (ɛddəkɑ̃, 'eɪddəˌkɒŋ). Mil.

The pronunciation normally appears immediately after the headword or subordinate word, but may be given elsewhere, for example when different senses have distinct pronunciations:

> adjoint ('ædʒɔɪnt), sb.[2] and a. [mod.Fr. adjoint, pa. pple. of adjoindre to ADJOIN, used as an appellative. Mod.Fr. form of prec.]
>
> ‖ A. sb.[2] (with pronunc. adʒwɛ̃). Official title of a French civil officer who assists the maire; also, an assistant professor in a French college.

For a detailed description of the IPA transcription used, see pp. xxxiii–xxxiv; a key to the symbols is given on p. lxv.

In some cases, it is unnecessary to give a full phonetic transcription; instead, the word is printed with a stress mark (') before the stressed syllable:

> aero'nautical, a. [f. prec. + -AL[1].] Of or belonging to aeronautics; connected with the navigation of the air.

Secondary stress is indicated by an inferior stress mark (ˌ):

> 'air-conˌditioning, vbl. sb. [cf. CONDITION v. 9.] The process of cleaning air and controlling its temperature and humidity before it enters a room, building, etc., and in certain

Quotations

The quotations illustrate the use of the word in a given sense, and are normally arranged in chronological order, starting with the earliest available printed example of the sense:

> aircraft ('ɛəkrɑːft, -æ-). [f. AIR- III. + CRAFT sb. 9.] Flying-machines collectively; a flying-machine.
>
> Since the 1930s commonly restricted to denote an aeroplane (as distinct from a balloon or airship) or aeroplanes collectively. The nineteenth-century examples refer to balloons and airships.
>
> 1850 J. WISE System of Aeronautics xvi. 102 The aircraft has but one medium, the water-craft has two. 1876 C. B. MANSFIELD Aerial Navig. 2 Air-craft seems an appropriate term for the whole apparatus, including boat and gas vessel, or car and balloon. Ibid. 11. viii. 323 The inventors of air-crafts. 1903 Aeronaut. Jrnl. VII. 81/1 His world-famed aircrafts. 1909 Daily Chron. 26 Feb. 1/2 The vast commercial possibilities that the manufacture and world-wide use of air craft offer. 1910 ROTCH in Epitome Aeronaut. Ann., [Suppose] an aircraft to possess the very moderate speed of 9 metres per second. 1910 Daily Mail 27 May 6/1 The three types of aircraft—the balloon, the airship, and the aeroplane. 1912 F. T. JANE All the World's Air-craft III. 7/1 It has .. been deemed advisable gradually to change the title of this annual to All the World's Air-craft, in order to avoid

A quotation in square brackets, usually preceding the first example, indicates a use which helps to illustrate the development of the sense, while not strictly exemplifying it:

> Hence ˌaeromagne'tometer, an instrument for making aeromagnetic measurements.
> [1946 R. BALSLEY in Petroleum Engineer Aug. 108/1 The obvious advantages of the air-magnetometer are its speed .. and the fact that it can be used where ground methods are .. unpracticable.] 1948 World Oil CXXVIII. 223 (heading) Aeromagnetometer profile flown from Venezuela to Texas. 1969 New Scientist 9 Jan. 58/2 An aeromagnetometer survey to last several months will be started shortly.

Where many combinations are treated together, the quotations illustrating each are grouped chronologically and the groups are arranged in the alphabetical order of the combinations. Asterisks are sometimes used to mark the first quotation for each combination:

> 1889 Cent. Dict., Air-blast. 1902 Encycl. Brit. XXXIII. 422/1 In..air-blast transformers. apertures are left in the core by means of which the cooling air can reach the interior portions. 1946 H. P. YOUNG Electr. Power Syst. Control (ed. 2) vii. 194 Air-blast breakers can be classified into three main types depending upon the manner in which the compressed air is directed at the arc. 1845 North Brit. Rev. IV. 128 An air-bloomery .. was dependent, for its blast, upon the varying currents of air that played around the hill on which it was placed. 1860 W. FORDYCE Hist. Coal 110 The first smelting furnace..was undoubtedly the Air-Bloomery, a low conical structure, with small openings at the bottom for the admission of air, and a larger orifice at the top for carrying off the gaseous products of combustion. 1855 OWEN Skel. & Teeth 7 The extremities of such air-bones present a light, open net-work. 1872 Rep. Comm. Patents 1871 I. 253 Westinghouse, George, Jr.,..Valve device for steam-power air-brake couplings. 1945 R. B. BLACK in Jrnl. Amer. Dental Assoc. XXXII. 956/2 The airbrasive process employs for its action a very fine—almost pinpoint—stream of compressed air into which a suitable finely divided abrasive agent has been introduced. 1953 I. GLICKMAN Clin. Periodontology xxxix. 665 Airbrasive which consists of fine abrasive powder (Dolemite in a stream of carbon dioxide) is used for removing surface deposits from the teeth. 1900 Cricket 29 Mar. 41/3 There is no necessity to mention Noble's air-breaks any more.

For an explanation of the typographical conventions used in quotations, see p. xxx.

Superior numbers

Superior numbers are used to distinguish homonyms (see alphabetical order above) and after the labels Obs. and rare to indicate words or senses for which only one ($^{-1}$) or no ($^{-0}$) contextual example from a printed source was available to the editors.

Variant forms

Variant forms of a word are printed in light bold type, and are introduced by 'Also' or 'Forms':

> ‖ abaca ('æbəkə). Also abaka. The native name of the palm (Musa textilis) which furnishes what is commonly known as Manilla Hemp; [etc.]
>
> aback (ə'bæk), adv. Forms: 1 on bæc; 2 a bec; 2–3 on bak, o bak; 2–5 a bak, abak; 4–8 a-back(e, abacke; 6– aback. [OE. on prep. bæc sb. = unto [etc.]

Numerals are used before variant forms to indicate the century during which a particular form is recorded: see p. xxvii.

KEY TO THE PRONUNCIATION

THE pronunciations given are those in use in the educated speech of southern England (the so-called 'Received Standard'), and the keywords given are to be understood as pronounced in such speech.

In the etymologies

* indicates a word or form not actually found, but of which the existence is inferred
:— = normal development of

The printing of a word in SMALL CAPITALS indicates that further information will be found under the word so referred to.

.. indicates an omitted part of a quotation.

- (in a quotation) indicates a hyphen doubtfully present in the original; (other text) indicates a hyphen inserted only for the sake of a line-break.

PROPRIETARY NAMES

THIS Dictionary includes some words which are or are asserted to be proprietary names or trade marks. Their inclusion does not imply that they have acquired for legal purposes a non-proprietary or general significance nor any other judgement concerning their legal status. In cases where the editorial staff have established in the records of the Patent Offices of the United Kingdom and of the United States that a word is registered as a proprietary name or trade mark this is indicated, but no judgement concerning the legal status of such words is made or implied thereby.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY

A (eɪ), the first letter of the Roman Alphabet, and of its various subsequent modifications (as were its prototypes Alpha of the Greek, and Aleph of the Phœnician and old Hebrew); representing originally in English, as in Latin, the 'low-back-wide' vowel, formed with the widest opening of jaws, pharynx, and lips. The plural has been written aes, A's, As. from A to Z: see Z 3.

c 1340 HAMPOLE Pr. Consc. 481 And by þat cry men knaw þan Whether it be man or weman, For when it es born it cryes swa. If it be man it says a! a! That þe first letter is of þe nam Of our forme-fader Adam. c 1386 CHAUCER Prol. 161 On which was first i-write a crowned A, And after, Amor vincit omnia. 1401 Pol. Poems II. 57 I know not an a [A] from the wynd-mylne, ne a b [B] from a bole-foot. 1678 BUTLER Hudib. III. i. 1006 And loue your Loues with A's and B's. 1765 TUCKER Light of Nat. II. 89 Tully tells us, a hog has been known to make a perfect letter A with his snout upon the ground; but nobody ever saw, or thought it possible to see, the whole poem of Ennius scratched out in that manner: and I believe he might have added safely, that no man ever saw a single A written by a hog, without a multitude of other irregular scratches round about it. a 1842 TENNYSON The Epic 50 Mouthing out his hollow oes and aes, Deep-chested music.

The sounds now represented by A are thus symbolized in this work:—

(1) (eɪ) in n*a*me (neɪm) (4) (ɑː) in f*a*ther ('fɑːðə(r))
(2) (ɛə) in b*a*re (bɛə(r)) (5) (ɔː) in w*a*ter ('wɔːtə(r))
(3) (æ) in m*a*n (mæn) (6) (ɒ) in w*a*nt (wɒnt)

The vowel in ch*a*nt, p*a*st, varies with different speakers from 3 to 4.

1 and 2 are also commonly represented by the digraphs ai, ay, as in p*ai*n, p*ay*, p*air* (peɪn, peɪ, pɛə(r)); and 5 by au, aw, as in laud, law (lɔːd, lɔː). Ai, ay rarely represent a diphthong (aɪ), as in ay, Is*ai*ah (aɪ, aɪ'zaɪə); au is a diphthong (aʊ) only in foreign words.

In unaccented syllables these vowels are modified, and obscured; thus:—

(7) ɪ in villa*g*e, marria*g*e ('vɪlɪdʒ, 'mærɪdʒ)
(8) ɪ/ə in separ*a*te, adj. ('sɛpərət, -ɪt)
(9) ə in lun*a*r, *a*mœb*a* ('luːnə(r), ə'miːbə)

In rapid utterance the ə may become a mere voice glide, or entirely disappear, as sep*a*rate adj. 'sɛpərət, 'sɛp(ə)rət, 'sɛprət. These phonetic variations in actual speech are reflected in variant spellings like mack*a*rel, mack*e*rel, mackrel; ab*a*net, abnet; car*a*vel, carvel; Cath*a*rine, Cath*e*rine, Cathrine; depend*a*nt, depend*e*nt; and common 'mistakes' in spelling, such as sep*e*rate.

II. The letters of the alphabet, or some of them, are also used to indicate serial order and distinguish things in a series, as the notes of the musical scale, the 'quires' or sheets of a book, classes of ships, propositions in logic, quantities in algebra, points, and hence lines and figures in geometry. As the order is in some cases fixed, A or a has some specialized uses:

1. In Music: The 6th note of the diatonic scale of C major, or the first note of the relative minor scale of C, corresponding to la in the Tonic Sol-fa notation. Also, the scale of a composition with A as its key-note; as 'a symphony in A'.

1609 DOULAND Ornithoparcus Micrologus 22 In the first part set A Base, in the third D sol re, in the fifth A lamire. 1806 CALLCOTT Gramm. of Music The notes of Music are named from the first seven letters of the alphabet, A, B, C, D, E, F, G. When the Melody, or Tune, exceeds these seven, the same series of letters must be repeated. 1880 GROVE Dict. Mus. I. 192 The beautiful and passionate Sonata in A which was inspired by and dedicated to his [Beethoven's] friend Madame Ertmann.

2. In Nautical language: see A1 below.

3. In Logic: a universal affirmative.

1866 MANSEL (in Bowen Logic 201) A is declared by Aristotle to be the most difficult proposition to establish, and the easiest to overthrow.

4. In Abstract reasoning, hypothetical argumentation, Law, etc. A means any one thing or person, B another, C a third, etc.; as, A becomes surety to B for C; C fails in his engagements, on which B, etc.

1870 BOWEN Logic iii. 49 Every conceivable thing is either A or not-A. Of course A and not-A, taken together, include the universe.

5. In Algebra: a, b, c, and other early letters of the alphabet are used to express known quantities, as x, y, z are to express the unknown.

6. Designating a first-class road.

1921 Autocar 29 Oct. 829/2 Those roads, however, which have already received numbers are all of the first, or A, category and it is by no means probable that their numbers will suffer any change after once being fixed... Six boundary roads radiating from London are taken as the basis. Road A1 is that from London to Edinburgh; A2 runs from London to Dover; A3 London to Portsmouth.

7. Used of a type of blood.

1927 Jrnl. Amer. Med. Assoc. LXXXVIII. 1422/1 Dr. Karl Landsteiner has suggested the substitution of the well known letters O, A, B and AB for the Jansky numbers I, II, III and IV and the Moss numbers IV, II, III and I. The letters will..express the actual constitution of the blood corpuscles with respect to iso-agglutination, as far as it concerns the separation of the groups. 1928 Jrnl. Exper. Med. XLVII. 757 They separate the human bloods into four sharply defined groups designated as O, A, B, and AB.

8. Sociol. Designating the highest (or †lowest) of a series of social classes; now spec. the higher managerial, administrative, or professional class; a member of this. AB (Sociol.): pl., the membership of the two highest social classes A and B; also in sing. and as adj.

1889 C. BOOTH Life & Labour I. i. ii. 33 The 8 classes into which I have divided these people are: A. The lowest class of occasional labourers, and semi-criminals. B. Casual earnings—'very poor' [etc.]. 1910 F. G. D'AETH in Sociol. Rev. III. 270 The present class structure is based upon different standards of life... These varying standards tend to fall into seven groups..A. The Loafer..B. Low-skilled labour..C. Artizan..D. Smaller Shopkeeper and clerk..E. Smaller Business Class..F. Professional and Administrative Class..G. The Rich. 1936 HARRISON & MITCHELL Home Market xii. 59 Blue Symbols represent A grade—where chief income earner receives £10 per week or more. 1950 D. C. JONES in Brit. Jrnl. Sociol. I. 51 It will simplify both our analysis and your classification if you begin by thinking in terms of five main social classes, which we have lettered in descending order A, B, C, D, E. 1968 M. ABRAMS in J. A. Jackson Social Stratification vi. 135 In the middle 1950's,..the National Readership Survey came under the direction of the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising (I.P.A.)... Interviewers recorded the occupation of each respondent... The stratification of respondents into six grades—A, B, C_1, C_2, D and E—was based exclusively on occupation. 1984 Social Trends (Central Statistical Office) No. 14. x. 142 Almost every household in social classes A and B possessed a dictionary in May 1982. 1966 Punch 10 Aug. 212/1 We have shown..that the ABs watch the same kind of programmes as everybody else. 1969 Listener 31 July 164 Such trusts appeal primarily to AB readers. 1976 New Society 1 Jan. 5/1 Upper middle class ABs living in the prosperous southern counties. 1986 Age (Melbourne) 18 Jan. 8/4 The social niceties..are very A, B. When I say 'dick', Liz pounces.

9. Designating a range of international standard paper sizes (as A0, A1, A2, etc.), based on a proportion of 1: $\sqrt{2}$, with each size in the series having half the surface area of the previous one (see quot. 1937). Cf. B II. 2(v), C II. 4.

1932 Industr. Standardization III. 203/2 The European main or A-series of paper sizes... The basic sheet with an area of one square meter is designated A0 (A zero); the next smaller sheet by A1; half of this by A2, etc. 1937 E. J. LABARRE Dict. Paper 277/1 The basic sizes are therefore: A-series = A0 = 841 × 1189 mm; B-series = B0 = 1000 × 1414 mm; C-series = C0 = 917 × 1297 mm. 1958 B.S.I. News Nov. 17/2 Another manufacturer..has laid down stocks of its 'Wove Writing' paper in three sizes from which the 'A' sizes can..be cut. 1962 F. T. DAY Introd. Paper vii. 71 At present there is much discussion of the advantages of what are termed A and B paper sizes. 1982 Financial Times 25 Oct. I. 12/7 The new chassis..is about the size of an A4 sheet of paper. 1983 Electronics 1 Dec. 3E (heading) Linear CCD array senses images on A3-size pages.

10. A-side, of a single-playing gramophone record: (the music recorded on) the side that is being promoted; contr. with B-side s.v. B II 2 b (vi).

1962 Melody Maker 7 July 10/1 No doubt the A side will get plenty of spins. 1968 Guardian 5 Jan. 18/4 The seven-man band arrived at the London recording studio to make the 'A' side of a new 'single'. 1970 J. LENNON in J. Wenner Lennon Remembers (1971) 49 Maybe if he was feeling guilty that he had most of the A-sides or something he'd give me a solo. 1984 Sounds 1 Dec. 6/5 The A-side features the inimitable talents of Jim Thirlwell on lead vocal.

IV. Phrases. 1. A per se: the letter A when standing by itself, especially when making a word.

The word a was formerly spelt 'a-per-se, a,' that is, 'a by itself makes the word a,' whence also the letter itself was sometimes called A-per-se-A. So also I per se, O per se, &-per-se (and-per-se, an-per-se, ampersee).

Hence b. fig. (also formerly Apersie, Apersey, A per C) the first, chief, most excellent, most distinguished, or unique person or thing; one who is facile princeps, or in modern phrase, A 1.

1475 HENRYSON Test. of Cresseide 78 (Speght's Chaucer) The floure and A per se of Troie and Grece. a 1500 *MS. 2. A 1. Applied in Lloyd's Register to ships in first-class condition, as to hull and stores alike. 'The character A denotes New ships, or Ships Renewed or Restored. The Stores of Vessels are designated by the figures 1 and 2; 1 signifying that the Vessel is well and sufficiently found.' —Key to the Register. Added to the names of ships, as 'the fast-sailing ship "Sea-breeze", A 1 at Lloyd's', or used attributively, 'the splendid A 1 clipper-built ship "Miranda".'

Hence, fig. (familiar and savouring of commercial phraseology), A 1, or in U.S. A No. 1, is used adjectively for 'prime, first-class'.

1837 DICKENS Pickwick 341 (1847) 'He must be a first-rater,' said Sam. 'A 1,' replied Mr. Roker. 1851 MRS. STOWE Dred I. 313 An A number one cook, and no mistake. 1861 COL. G. WOLSELEY (Reynolds' Newsp. Nov. 24) The Chinese police are certainly A 1 at such work.

†a, a.[1] (definite numeral). Obs. or dial. [OE. án, one, of which the n began to disappear before a cons. about 1150. In the definite numeral sense, án and á, following the ordinary course of OE. long á, became in the south bef. 1300, on (oon, one), o (oo); and eventually o became obs., leaving one as the form in all positions; while an and a, pronounced lightly and indistinctly, became the 'indefinite article.' See next word. But in the north an (or ane) and a were written in both senses, the stress or emphasis alone distinguishing the numeral from the article.]

Apocopate form of an, ane, used only before a consonant. See AN(E, O a., and ONE.

A in the various forms a, ae, eae, eea, yea, yà, is still the regular form of the numeral one when used adjectively, in the northern dialects, the absolute form being an, ane, ean, yen, yàn, etc.

a (toneless ə; emph. eɪ), a.[2] ('indefinite article'). Before a vowel-sound an (ən, emph. æn). [A weakening of OE. án, 'one', already by 1150 reduced before a cons. to a. About the same time the numeral began to be used in a weakened sense (usually unexpressed in OE. as he wæs gód man, 'he was a good man'; cf. Chron. 1137 'he wæs god munec & god man,' and 1140 'he wæs an yuel man'); becoming in this sense proclitic and toneless, ăn, ă, while as a numeral it remained long, ān, ā, and passed regularly during the next cent. into ōn, ō; see the prec. word. Though an began to sink to a in midl. dial. by 1150, it often remained bef. a cons. to 1300; bef. sounded h, an was retained after 1600, and somet. after 1700, as an house, an heifer, an hermitage. The present rule is to use an bef. a vowel-sound (incl. h mute, as an hour); a bef. a consonant-sound (including h sounded, and eu-, u- with sound of yū-, as a host, a one, a eunuch, a unit). But in unaccented syllables, many, perhaps most, writers still retain an bef. sounded h, some even bef. eu, u, as an historian, an euphonic vowel, an united appeal, though this is all but obsolete in speech, and in writing a becomes increasingly common in this position. A, an has been indeclinable in midl. and north. dial. since 1150, but vestiges of the OE. declension (as nom. f. ane, gen. m. anes, gen. & dat. f. are, acc. m. anne) remained much later in southern. In north. an was frequently written ane (with e mute), the use of a and an(e being as elsewhere; but about 1475 Scottish writers began to use ane in all positions, a praetice which prevailed till the disuse of literary Scotch after 1600. About the 15th cent. a or an was commonly written in comb. with the following sb. as aman, anoke, anele. When they were separated, much uncertainty prevailed as to the division; thus we find a nend, a noke, a nadder, an adder, an est. In some words a mistaken division has passed into usage: see ADDER, NEWT.

A is strictly adjective and can only be used with a substantive following. Meanings:—

1. One, some, any: the oneness, or indefiniteness, being implied rather than asserted. It is especially used in first introducing an object to notice, which object, after being introduced by a, is kept in view by the; as 'I plucked a flower; this is the flower.' Used before a noun singular, and its attributes.

a. Ordinarily before the name of an individual object or notion, or of a substance, quality or state individualized, and before a collective noun, as a tree, a wish, an ice, a beauty, a new ink, a greater strength, a second youth, a legion, a hundred, a pair.

c 1175 Lamb. Hom. 121 Vre drihten wes iled to sleȝe al swa me dede a scep. 1297 R. GLOUC. 78 He hadde a gret ost in a lutel stonde. 1847 LONGF. Ev. I. i. 59 A celestial brightness —a more ethereal beauty. Mod. An ink that will retain its fluidity; a permanent black. Is it a red wheat? What kind of a wine is this? To walk out in a pouring rain. There was a something—of that we may be sure. Oh, a mere nothing.

b. Also before proper names, used connotatively, with reference to the qualities of the individual; or figuratively as the type of a class.

c. A follows the adj. in many a, such a, what a! and the obs. or dial. each a, which a; it follows any adj. preceded by how, so, as, too, as how large a sum; and in earlier Eng. the genit. phrases what manner, no manner, whatkins, nakins, what sort, etc., as what manner a man = cujusmodi homo? (See these words.)

In none of these was the a found in Old English.

Many a is not to be confused with the approximative a many (see 2). Such a was earlier (2–3) a such. Each a and which a survive in the north, as ilk a, whilk a. What manner a, and its likes soon became corrupted to what manner of. See A prep.[2] = of.

As fine a child as you will see.

d. With nouns of multitude, after which the gen. sign, or prep. of, has been omitted, a comes apparently before pl. nouns. Compare a score of men, a dozen (of) men, hundreds of men, a hundred men, a thousand miles; and the obs. a certain of men or a certain men, now certain men. 2. A with numeral adjectives removes their definiteness, or expresses an approximate estimate: some, a matter of, about; as a sixty fathom, a six years, a two hundred spears; so also a many men, a few retainers, the latter already in OE. áne feawa (áne plural = some). An exceedingly common use of a in 14–16th c. Now obs. except in a few, a great many, a good many (a many, a good few, a small few, dialectal). See also under these words.

3. In a more definite sense: One, a certain, a particular; the same. Now only used in a few phrases like once on a day; two at a time; two, three, all of a sort, a size, a price, an age.

c 1220 St. Katherine (Abb. Cl.) 1 Constantin & Maxence weren on a time..hehest in Rome. 1523 LD. 4. 'Denoting the proportion of one thing to another.' J.; chiefly of rate or price: in each, to or for each; as a hundred a year, twenty pounds a man, thirty shillings a head, sixpence an ounce, a penny a line. This was originally the preposition a, OE. an, on, defining time, as in twice a day; whence by slight extension, a penny a day (par jour, per diem). Then, being formally identified with the indef. art., a, an was extended analogically from time, to space, measure, weight, number, as a penny a mile, sixpence a pound (la livre), tenpence a hundred, so much a head. See A prep.[1] 8 b.

† a (ə), pron. Obs. or dial. [for ha = HE, HEO, HI, he, she, .(it), they, when stressless; chiefly in southern and western writers. A for he (ha in the Ayenbit) is common from 3 to 5; in the dramatists of 6, 7, it is frequent in representations of familiar speech. A for ha, heo, = she, they, is rarer and somewhat doubtful in Layamon, but common in Trevisa; not found after 1450. Owing to the persistence of grammatical gender in the south, Trevisa also uses a = he of inanimate objects, and so apparently = it, which takes its place when rationality and sex are substituted for gender in the concord of the pronouns. The s.w. dialects still apply he to inanimate objects. See further under HE.]

Exceedingly frequent in 13–17th c.; in later times chiefly in representations of colloquial or familiar speech, in which it is still often said, though infrequently written, except in specimens of local dialects, where also, under literary influence, it is generally spelt ha, ha', although no h is pronounced.

a (ə), prep.[1] Also o. [A worn-down proclitic form of OE. preposition an, on. In compounds and common phrases this became a even in OE., as abútan, a timan. The separate an was labialized to on, which form also (in West Saxon) absorbed the prep. in, and so had the meanings on, in; unto, into, to. In 11th c., on began to be reduced before consonants to o, which from its tonelessness soon sank to a (ə). Before a vowel an was occasionally used; when emphatic on remained. The separate a is now rarely used, being replaced by the full on, in, or the various prepositions which represent them in modern idiom; except in a few verbal constructions, as to go a begging, to set a going; and in temporal distributive phrases, as twice a day, once a year, where it has been confused with the 'indefinite article.' See A a.[2] 4. But the preposition a really remains in a large number of combinations, where present spelling treats it as a prefix to the governed word, and the whole as a compound adverb, as abed, afoot, aback, around, atop, afloat, asleep, alive. As these combinations are now viewed as individual words, they will be found in their alphabetical places. The separate uses of a, treated here, are very numerous, but all included in those of OE. on.]

b. Especially, with adverbs of repetition: once, twice, many times, oft a day (OE. on dæȝe), twice a week, thrice a year.

In this construction a is now generally explained as the 'indefinite article'; and it has, through such phrases as a penny a day, fourteen shillings a weeks, led to the use of a to express rate, or proportion, as in a penny a mile, tenpence a pound. Comp. French deux francs par jour, and deux francs la livre. See A a.[2] 4.

11. State: in; as a live, a sleep, a work, a jar, a thirst, a blaze, a fright, a float, a stare. In these the word governed by a was originally a noun, e.g. life, sleep, work, float ('on the Mediterranean flote,' Shaks. Temp. I. ii. 234), but being often the verbal sb. of state or act, it has been in modern times erroneously taken as a verb, and used as a model for forming such adverbial phrases from any verb, as a-wash, a-blaze, a-bask, a-swim, a-flaunt, a-blow, a-dance, a-run, a-stare, a-gaze, a-howl, a-tremble, a-shake, a-jump. These are purely modern and analogical.

12. Process; with a verbal sb. taken passively: in process of, in course of, undergoing. Varying with in: 'forty and six years was this temple in building.' arch. or dial.

(In modern language the a is omitted and the verbal sb. treated as a participle, passive in sense; as the house was a building, the house was building. In still more modern speech a formal participle passive appears: the house was being built.)

13. Action; with a verbal sb. taken actively.

a. with be: engaged in. arch. or dial.

(In literary Eng. the a is omitted, and the verbal sb. treated as a participle agreeing with the subject, and governing its case, to be fishing, fighting, making anything. But most of the southern dialects, and the vulgar speech both in England and America, retain the earlier usage.)

a (ə), prep.[2] Obs. [worn down from of, f being dropped bef. a cons., and the toneless o sunk into the neutral ə, which being the ordinary sound of toneless a, as in a man, ămain, Americă, was here also written a. It was once the ordinary representative of of in certain phrases, as men a war, cloth a gold, inns a court, time a day, fustian a Napes, out a doors (where apparently confused with at, cf. in a doores) and familiarly in many others. In mod. spelling, of when contracted is written o', but the familiar pronunciation is still (ə) as in man o'(ə) war.]

†3. After manner, kind, sort, etc. a, orig. the 'indef. article,' was taken as = of. Orig. what manner was in the genitive relation, thus: what manner a man? cujusmodi homo? what manner men? cujusmodi homines? By being taken as = of, a was first extended to the plural, as 'what manner a men?' and then changed to of, as in the mod. 'what manner of men?' which no longer answers to cujusmodi homines? but to qui modus hominum? The dialects retain the original 'kind a' as kinda, kinder. Obs. See further S.V. 4. Appended to lines 'in burlesque poetry, to lengthen out a syllable, without adding to the sense.' J. Not originally burlesque, but probably originating in the necessary retention of the ME. final -e where wanted for measure, the origin of which being forgotten, it was treated as an addition of ă. Thus ME. sonne—yronne, would be treated as sun a!—run a!

Hence prob. the modern ballad and lyrical O! (which is not burlesque) as in 'My Nannie, O.'

†a, a- (ə) particle, prefixed to the pa. pple. and occasionally to other parts of the verb, = earlier ȝe- [Ger. ge-, Goth. ga-, together, altogether, completely], which in OE. was sparingly used as a prefix to the pple. (more commonly making a compound verb), but in 2–4 became, as ȝe-, y-, i-, the regular sign of the pa. pple. in the south, as y-come, i-don, i-sen, y-ben, i-ben, i-be, etc. The toneless (ɪ) afterwards sank into (ə), as it is still pronounced in the south-western dialects, and was frequently written a distinct, or a- joined, in 14–16th c. As many verbs had also a derivative form in a- in OE. (as wake awake, rise arise), and many others were formed after them in ME., it is not always easy to say whether a pa. pple. in a- is to be referred to the simple verb, or to a derivative verb in a-, of which no other part is known. So in mod. G. ge-standen may be pa. pple. of stehen, or of ge-stehen. See I-, Y-.

a-, prefix, from various sources.

1. OE. a-, originally ar- (rarely preserved, as in ar-ræfnan), OHG. ar-, ir- ur- (mod. G. er-), Goth. us- ur-, implying motion onward or away from a position, hence away, on, up, out, and thus with verbs of motion adding intensity; as in a-bide, a-go, a-rise, a-wake, and many obs. verbs; after the analogy of which it was subsequently prefixed to other vbs., not found with it in OE., as a-curse. In some words this a- has been formally confused with OFr. a-:—L. ad-, ac-, af-, etc. (No. 7), and, like this, refashioned after assumed L. analogies, as in a(c)-curse, for a-curse, a(l)-lay for a-lay, a(f)-fright for a-fright, etc.

2. ME. a-:—OE. an, on, prep. See A prep.[1] above. With nouns, in, on, engaged in, at, in loose combinations, which are really two words; as abed, ashore, afield, asleep, alive. With verbs, adverbs, and prepositions, more closely combined both in form and sense, as aknow, ashame, afore, among, across.

3. ME. a-:—OE. of prep. (see A prep.[2]) meaning off, from, in a-down, a-thirst; of, in akin, anew, afresh, a-clock.

4. ME. a-:—OE. and- against, opposite, as in a-long.

5. ME. a- for AT prep., Norse at prep. 'to,' used in the north as sign of the infinitive = to. In ado, early northern Eng. at do. See also A-DOORS.

6. ME. a- for i-, y-:—ȝe-, as in a(f)-ford, along = owing to, and in southern pa. pples. as a-done, etc. See A particle above.

7. ME. a- = Fr. pref. a-:—L. ad-, to, at, hence sometimes expressing addition or increase, sometimes bringing into a state; as in abandon, abase, abate, abut, achieve, adroit, agree, alarm, amass, amaze, ameliorate, amerce, amount, amuse, apropos, avail, avenge, avenue, aver, avouch, avow. In 14th cent. a practice arose among French scribes of refashioning words originally having this prefix, after L. ad- and its phonetic variants ac-, af-, ag-, al-, an-, ap-, ar-, as-, at-; this extended in 15th c. to Eng., where the great majority of words from OFr. were so treated, so as to simulate a direct formation from L. Cf. a(d)dress, a(c)count, a(f)fect, a(g)grieve, a(l)lege, a(n)noy, a(p)pear, a(c)quit, a(r)rive, a(s)sent, a(t)tain, a(d)venture, a(d)vertise, a(d)vise, a(d)vocate, a(d)vowson, where etymological spelling would have simple a-. It was even extended to words not derived from L. ad-, as a(d)vance, Fr. avancer, L. ab-anteāre; a(c)knowledge, OE. on- + knowledge; a(c)curse, OE. a- + curse.

8. ME. a- = Fr. a-:—L. ab off, away, from; as in a-bridge (ab-breviāre), a-steyne, a-soil. Sometimes afterwards refashioned, as ab-stain, or confused with the prec. and erroneously respelt, as as-soil.

9. ME. a- = Anglo-Fr. a- for OFr. e-, es-:—L. ex- out, utterly; as in a-mend (L. emendare) abash (OFr. esbahiss-), afforce (esforcer), affray (esfrei), and many forms, now obs. or refashioned, as a-may, as-aumple, as-cape, a-move; or where the a- has been lost by aphesis, as scapement, sample, spenser; or has been confused with No. 10 and refashioned with en-, as ex-emplum, es-emple, a-saumple, an-sample, en-sample; or with ad- as admerveille.

10. ME. a-:—earlier Eng. and Anglo-Fr. an-, OFr. en-. This Anglo-Fr. an- was formally confused with OE. an- (see No. 2), and like it reduced bef. a cons. to a-, as in abushment, acloy, acumber, alumine, apeach, apair, apoison. In most cases these words are now obs. or refashioned, as ambushment, encumber, enlumine, impeach; or have been aphetized, as peach, cloy, limn; or have been further confused with words in a-:—L. ad- (No. 7), and erroneously respelt accordingly, as accloy, accumber, allumine, appair, appeach.

11. Many words with a- in one or other of the preceding senses have aphetic forms with the a- lost, as adown down, amid mid, alive live, amend mend, abate bate. In others the force of the prefix is so little apparent, that the derivatives in a- hardly differ in sense from their primitives, as in rise arise, wake awake, grieve a(g)grieve, cumber acumber, done adone. Hence, it naturally happened that all these a- prefixes were at length confusedly lumped together in idea, and the resultant a- looked upon as vaguely intensive, rhetorical, euphonic, or even archaic, and wholly otiose. With this vague feeling, a- was often prefixed by Spenser and other artificial archaists of the 16th cent. to words both of OE. and Romance origin, where it had no historical or etymological basis and can only be explained as due to vague form-association. This also was often treated like a-:—L. ad (No. 7), and spelt ad-, ac-, af-, ag-, etc. accordingly.

12. a-, from L. a = ad prefix and preposition, to; reduced in late Latin to a- before sc-, sp-, st-; as in a-scend, a-spirate, a-scribe, a-spect, a-spersion, a-spire, a-spirate, a-strict, a-stringent. See AD-.

13. a-, from L. a = ab, prefix and preposition from, off, away; only before v, as in avert. See AB-.

14. a-, from Gr. ἀ-, used bef. a cons. for ἀν-, pref. of privation or negation = without, not, -less, in words introd. into Eng. through L. and Fr. as abysm, adamant, amethyst; or through L. as acatalectic, adiaphorous, apetalous; or from Gr. direct (or through a mod. lang.) as amorphous, adipsy; or formed on Gr. elements, as abiogenetic, agnostic. In the latter case, a- has become a living prefix of negation = un-, non-, applied not only to words from Gr., as a-cotyledonous, a-chromatic, a-philanthropy, but also to technical words from L., as a-caulous, a-sexual.

15. a-, from Gr. ἀ- intensive, as in a-bolla, a-maurosis, a-tlas.

-a, suffix, from various sources.

1. OE. -a (:—early Teut. -o) nom. ending of masc. -n stem nouns, and foreign words associated with them, as ox-a, ass-a (L. asinŏ-), drac-a (L. dracōn-). This -a became in ME. -e, as ox-e, ass-e, drak-e; in mod. E. dropped, or preserved only as a spelling expedient, ox, ass, drake (= dreik). Hence a com. ending of OE. names and titles of men, as in Ida, Ella, Offa, Ceadda (Chad), Bæda (Bede), Bretwalda.

2. Gr. and L. -a, nom. ending of fem. nouns of first decl., some of which have been adopted unchanged, as idea, chimæra, basilica, area, arena, camera, corolla, formula, lamina, peninsula; and esp. Nat. Hist. terms (often med. or mod.L.) as alumina, ammonia, soda; alga, asafœtida, calceolaria, campanula, dahlia, fuchsia, lobelia; hyæna, boa, cicada, salpa, amœba; and geog. as Africa, Asia, Corsica, Malta. Also proper names of women, as Diana, Lydia, Julia, Maria, Aurora, Anna, Ada, Sophia, Victoria; latinized forms of OE. names, as Hilda (Hild), Godiva (Godȝifu), Elfrida (Ælfþryð), Ethelburga (Æðelburȝ); med. or mod. female names formed on male names, as Louis-a, Joann-a, Albert-a, Alexandr-a, Robin-a, Carol-in-a, Georg-in-a, Henri-ett-a. (L. names of women and places remain unchanged, except when the Fr. form has been adopted, as Maria, Marie, Mary; Italia, Italie, Italy; Diana, Diane, Dian (arch.); Eurōpa, Europe; Africa, Afrique, Afric (arch.); Græcia, Grèce, Greece;

India, Inde, Ind (arch.); Hispania, Espayne, Spain.)

3. Mod. Rom. (It., Sp., Pg.) -a, ending of fem. nouns, as lava, opera, piazza, regatta, sonata, stanza, tufa, umbrella; armada, flotilla, mantilla, peseta, vanilla; hence in proper names of women, as Isabella, Berengaria, Eva; and occasionally a sex-suffix, as don, donn-a, duenn-a; signor, -a; amoros-o, -a; infant-e, -a; sultan, -a; czar, czar-in-a.

4. Gr. and L. -a, plural ending of neuter nouns, some of which have been adopted unchanged, as phenomen-on, -a; strat-um, -a; dat-um, -a; miasma, -ta; genus, gener-a; hence frequent in (mod.) L. plural names of classes of animals, as Mammali-a, Amphibi-a, Crustace-a, Mollusc-a, Protozo-a, Quadruman-a, Cetace-a, Macrur-a, of which the sing. is variously supplied by Mammal, Mollusc, Quadruman, Crustacean, Amphibian, etc.

5. Repr. colloq. or dial. pronunc. of: a. do, as whatta you want? (see WHADD(A)YA), etc.; b. have (see A v. b); c. of (see A prep.[2] 1); d. to, as GOTTA, OUGHTA, WANNA, etc.

abboddie, early form of ABBATIE, Obs., abbacy.

abbodisse, OE. form of ABBATESS, Obs., abbess.

abbot ('æbət). Forms: 1 abbad, abbud; 1-3 abbod; 2-3 abbeod; 3-4 abbed; 2- abbot. By-form 2-7 abbat. [a. abbād-em, late L. and early Rom. pronunc. of L. abbāt-em, in nom. abbas (4th c.), a. Gr. ἀββάς, ad. Syriac abbā, father (see ABBA), an appellation given originally in the East to all monks (cf. Ital. and Sp. padre, Fr. père), but restricted at length in the West to the superior of a monastery. Adopted in Eng. at or soon after the English Conversion; the original abbad became by assimilation to the native ending -ud, -od, abbud, abbod, whence the 13th c. abbed; the mod. representative would have been abd (cf. Ger. abt), but in 12th c. the L. abbāt-em gave a new literary form abbat, under the influence of which OE. abbod became abbot, found as early as 1123. Abbat continued as a by-form till 1700, and was especially affected by the ecclesiastical writers of 5-7. The difference is merely graphical, the atonic -ot and -at being alike (-ət).]

1. The head or superior of an abbey. After the dissolution of the monasteries, sometimes applied to the layman to whom the revenues of an abbacy were impropriated.

4. A wandering of the intellect, an abnormal state of any intellectual faculty; deficiency or partial alienation of reason.

1823 LINGARD Hist. Eng. VI. 312 Her affliction seemed to produce occasional aberrations of intellect. 1829 SCOTT Demonology x. 354 Shades of mental aberration have afterwards occurred. 1878 SEELEY Stein II. 554 The slightest aberration in his [Napoleon's] mind, might be represented by the complete transformation of Europe.

5. Deviation from the ordinary or normal type of any natural production; abnormal structure or development.

1846 LYTTON Lucretia (1853) Pref., And the pbenomena that seemed aberrations from nature were explained. 1869 BUCKLE Civ. II. vii. 403 Tbe apparent aberrations presented by minerals are strictly regular. Ibid. III. v. 444 He studied the aberrations of structure and of function.

6. Optics. The non-convergence of rays of light, reflected or refracted, to one focus.

That due to the failure of a spherical mirror or lens to cause all the rays to meet in a single point (as is effected by a parabolic mirror or lens) is called spherical aberration; the distance of any ray from the geometrical focus, when measured along the axis, is its longitudinal aberration, and when measured at right angles to the axis, its lateral aberration. Chromatic aberration is an additional irregularity in the refraction of light through lenses, due to the different refrangibilities of the different coloured constituents of white light, whereby these diverge from one another, fringing the images of objects with the prismatic colours.

1753 CHAMBERS Cycl. Supp. There are two species of the aberrations of rays..one arising from the figure of the glass or speculum, the other from the unequal refrangibility of the rays of light. 1868 LOCKYER Elem. Less. Astron. No. 466. 217 If such an achromatic lens be truly made, and its curves properly regulated, it is said to have its spherical aberration corrected as well as its chromatic one, and the image of a star will form a nearly colourless point at its focus.

7. Astron. The displacement of the true position of a heavenly body to an observer on the earth, occasioned by the joint effect of the earth's motion, and the non-instantaneous transmission of light; hence also called aberration of light.

As the earth has two motions, there is a diurnal as well as an annual aberration, the amount of the former being, for a star, very minute. Planetary aberration is effected by the additional element of the motion of the planet itself, during the time occupied by the passage of its light to the earth.

1856 LARDNER Astron. §2448 The apparent displacement produced by aberration is always in the direction of the earth's motion. 1867 E. B. DENISON Astron. without Math. 193 We may explain aberration thus: If you are running when the rain comes down straight without any wind, you get wet in front and not behind, and the rain beats against you as it would if you were standing still, and the wind blowing in your face. And if you carry an empty telescope tube pointed straight up, the rain will not fall through it, but will strike against the back inside: if you want the rain to fall through, you must slope the tube forwards, more or less according to your velocity forwards compared with that of the rain downwards. Then for rain substitute light, and the motion of the earth for your own running, and you know what aberration is. 1869 DUNKIN Midnight Sky 157 Dr. Bradley..made the important discovery of the aberration of light.

aberrational (ˌæbə'reɪʃənəl), a. [f. prec. + -AL¹.] Of, pertaining to, or characterized by aberration; eccentric, irrational, or unsound. Also, diverging from the normal, abnormal.

1866 Reader No. 164. 170/1 The aberrational myths of early ages. 1909 W. BATESON Mendel's Princ. Heredity I. x. 178 It is probable that the various aberrational forms of mammals and birds so often recorded by systematists as 'isabelline' are all similar cases of the replacement of black by chocolate. 1923 GLAZEBROOK Dict. Appl. Physics IV. 314/2 The differences between the cosines and unity occur as a small correcting factor in the aberrational expression. 1975 Church Times 7 Nov. 11/1 There is much more to the current upsurge of intuitivism that is positive and healthy than is aberrational. 1978 R. STEVENS Law & Politics (1979) 69 There were at least two aberrational years before 1900 when Scottish appeals exceeded English.

abiogenesis (ˌæbɪəʊ'dʒɛnɪsɪs), Biol. [f. Gr. ἄβιος without life (f. ἀ priv. + βίος life) + γένεσις birth: see GENESIS.] The (supposed) origination or evolution of living organisms from lifeless matter without the action of living parents; 'spontaneous generation.' (Introduced by Prof. Huxley in addressing Brit. Assoc. at Liverpool, Sept. 1870.)

1870 HUXLEY in Brit. Assoc. Rep. lxxvi. To save circumlocution, I shall call.. the doctrine that living matter may be produced by not-living matter, the hypothesis of Abiogenesis. 1875 Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9) s.v., Abiogenesis, as a name for the production of living by not-living matter, has of late been superseding the less accurate phrase 'Spontaneous Generation.'

abiogenetic (ˌæbɪəʊdʒə'nɛtɪk), a. Biol. [f. Gr. ἄβιος without life + γενητ-ός originated + -IC.] Of or pertaining to abiogenesis.

abiogenetically (ˌæbɪəʊdʒə'nɛtɪkəlɪ), adv. Biol. [f. prec. + -AL[1] + -LY[2].] In an abiogenetic manner; by way of abiogenesis.

1875 HUXLEY in Encycl. Brit. (ed. 9) s.v. Biology 688 (also Anat. Inv. An. i. 36) Therefore they have been formed abiogenetically.

abiogenic (ˌeɪbaɪəʊ'dʒɛnɪk), a. [f. as ABIOGENESIS: see -GENIC.] Not derived from living organisms; occurring independently of life or life processes, but perhaps preceding or leading to them. Opp. BIOGENIC a. 2.

1891 19th Cent. Jan. 18 This method of creation may.. have been repeated.. with abiogenic germs. 1957 A. SYNGE tr. Oparin's Orig. Life on Earth (ed. 3) v. 153 During.. those many millions of years which separate the time of the formation of the Earth from the appearance of life on it, there took place the abiogenic, organic-chemical evolution of carbon compounds. 1968 Proc. R. Soc. B. CLXXI. 54 The land surface.. may have provided ideal conditions for the abiogenic synthesis of organic compounds. 1973 B. J. WILLIAMS Evolution & Human Origins vii. 94/1 The abiogenic production of organic molecules. 1983 Precambrian Res. XXIII. 1 (heading) Ancient microspheres: abiogenic, protobiogenic, or biogenic?

Hence abio'genically adv. = ABIOGENETICALLY adv., ABIOTICALLY adv.

1965 Proc. R. Soc. A. CCLXXXVIII. 441 Many of the present-day biologically important molecules have been constructed abiogenically from the primeval atmosphere. 1971 Nature 10 Sept. 136/2 When life started, the principal mode of metabolism is thought to have been anaerobic fermentation of organic compounds which had formed abiogenically in the primaeval environment.

abiogenist (ˌæbɪ'ɒdʒənɪst). Biol. [f. Gr. ἄβιος without life + -γεν-ής born, produced + -IST.] One who holds the hypothesis of abiogenesis.

1870 HUXLEY Crit. & Addr. (1873) x. 233 It has been a common objection of Abiogenists that, if the doctrine of Biogeny is true, the air must be thick with germs. 1877 Echo 22 Oct. 4/1 Except to the Abiogenists, or believers in spontaneous generation, the origin of the first protoplasmic mass is just as much a problem, whether it is fashioned from ordinary matter, or originates from matter infused and organised by a spiritual substance.

abiogenous (ˌæbɪ'ɒdʒənəs), a. Biol. [f. Gr. ἄβιος without life + -γεν-ής born + -OUS.] Coming into existence without springing from antecedent living beings; produced by 'spontaneous generation.'

abiogeny (ˌæbɪ'ɒdʒənɪ). [f. Gr. ἄβιος without life + -γενεια birth.] = ABIOGENESIS.

abiological (ˌæbɪə'lɒdʒɪkəl, ˌeɪbaɪəʊ-), a. [f. Gr. ἀ not + BIOLOGICAL; f. Gr. βίος life + λόγ-ος discourse + -ICAL.] Not pertaining to biology; pertaining to the study of inanimate things. Also, abiotic, inanimate.

1868 H. B. JONES Croonian Lect. ii. 63 In the abiological sciences the earliest ideas of matter were quite separate from the ideas of force. 1877 HUXLEY Anat. Inv. An. i. 1 The biological sciences are sharply marked off from the abiological, or those which treat of the phenomena manifested by not-living matter. 1970 Nature 14 Mar. 1029/1 Glycine and alanine are amino-acids most commonly synthesized in simulated primitive Earth (abiological) environments. 1981 G. PORTER in W. Palz et al. Energy from Biomass 672 We may seek to construct an abiological photosynthetic system.

abiotic (eɪbaɪ'ɒtɪk), a. [f. A- pref. 14 + BIOTIC a.; cf. Gr. ἄβιος without life.] a. Characterized by the absence of life; inanimate. b. That is harmful to or destructive of living organisms.

1893 in DUNGLISON Dict. Med. Sci. 1950 F. D. HOWITT in Brit. Encycl. Med. Practice (ed. 2) I. 158 Ultra-violet rays between 1,894 Å and 2,900 Å are called abiotic rays, for they are inimical to life. 1952 New Biol. XII. 99 In abiotic times, such molecules, rich in free energy, might survive for long periods. 1961 J. KEOSIAN in Encycl. Biol. Sciences 672/2 Abiotic synthesis of organic compounds, first simple then complex, preceded the origin of life on earth.

Hence ˌabi'otically adv., in an abiotic manner; without the involvement of living cells or organisms.

1952 New Biol. XIII. 125 N. H. Horowitz.. attributes the evolution of enzyme chains and cycles to an adaptive response to the using up of the limited stock of abiotically formed energy-rich molecules. 1970 Nature 5 Dec. 924/2 The discovery.. supports the hypothesis that the whole collection of amino-acids was produced abiotically. 1982 Geol. Rundschau LXXI. 1 (heading) Organic compounds in the early atmosphere formed abiotically from atomic carbon.

abirritant (æb'ɪrɪtənt), a. and sb. Med. [f. L. ab off, away + IRRITANT.] Any soothing agent which causes diminution of irritation.

abirritate (æb'ɪrɪteɪt), v. Med. [f. L. ab off, away + IRRITATE.] To cause diminution of irritation.

abirritation (æbˌɪrɪ'teɪʃən). Med. [f. L. ab off, away + IRRITATION.] A condition of the system opposite to that of irritation; a depressed condition of the various tissues.

1879 Syd. Soc. Lex.

abirritative (æb'ɪrɪteɪtɪv), a. Med. [f. L. ab off, away + IRRITATIVE.] Characterized by or due to abirritation.

ablatitious (æblə'tɪʃəs), a. [f. L. ablāt-us taken away, removed (see ABLATE) + -ITIOUS, L. -īcius; cf. addit-itious.] Having the quality or character of a withdrawal or deduction. ablatitious force (in Astr.) that which diminishes the gravitation of a satellite towards its planet, esp. of the moon towards the earth.

The moon being sometimes nearer to, and sometimes farther from, the sun than the earth, the attraction of the sun on the moon will sometimes be greater, and sometimes less, than his attraction on the earth. The difference estimated along the tangent to the moon's orbit and along the radius drawn from her position to the earth is called the tangential and central disturbing force respectively. The central disturbing force is ablatitious when it lessens the gravitation of the moon towards the earth. It is ablatitious in syzygies and addititious in quadratures.

1833 SIR J. HERSCHEL Astron. xi. 352 This..is termed the ablatitious force, because it tends to diminish the gravity. Ibid. 365 The average effect..gives the preponderance to the ablatitious or enfeebling power.

ablative ('æblətɪv), a. and sb. [a. Fr. ablatif, -ive, ad. L. ablātīv-us, lit. of or pertaining to removal from, f. ablāt- ppl. stem of auferre to carry away (see ABLATE and -IVE); applied by Cæsar to a case of the noun found in L. but not in Gr. In Latin only used in the grammatical sense.]

1. Name of one of the cases of the noun in Latin and some other Aryan languages, the proper function of which was to express direction from a place, or time. In Latin it was extended to the source whence an action proceeds, the cause or ideal source of an event, the instrument and agent or material sources of an action, the manner in which, and sometimes the place and time at which anything is done. Often used substantively, case being understood.

The ablative was one of the original Aryan cases. In Greek, Teutonic, and Slavonic, it was lost or formally confounded with other cases; but it survived in Latin, where it had absorbed the Instrumental, and in part the Locative of earlier Aryan (whence its extension in L. to other than ablative senses). The case, not occurring in Greek, was without a name, till the appropriate one of Cāsus Ablātīvus was given to it, from its primary function, by Julius Caesar. Since the rise of Comparative Philology the name has been applied to the same case wherever found existing, as well as to the relation properly expressed by it, however this may be formally shown.

ablative absolute, in Latin Grammar, an ablative case of a noun with a participle in concord, expressing the time, occasion, or circumstance of a fact stated, as sole oriente, tenebrae aufugiunt, at, upon, or through the sun rising, darkness flees away.

The initial silent h has been generally dropped in Eng. from the first, though many classical scholars tried to restore it in 6-7. In 5 the Fr. hable, able was refashioned after L. as abille, habil, habile, and spellings imitating either these or L. habil-em occur in Eng. and Sc. writers in 6-7, of which habile has come down to the present day, as a differentiated form, able leaning in mod. use to the sense of power, habile to that of skill. Of the derivatives ability has lost the h, but habilitate, habilitation, habiliment retain it, through being narrowed down to senses which connect themselves with mod.Fr. habit, habiller. In earlier senses, which clearly connected themselves with able and ability, we find abiliment, abilitate, and abilitation.]

-able, a. Fr. -able:—L. -ābilem, adj. suffix, the special form taken by the suffix -bili- (see -BLE) when added to vbs. in -āre, Fr. -er. Extended in Fr. to vbs. of all conjugations, -ble taking the place of -nt in pr. pple., thus périss-able, recev-able, vend-able, défend-able, mouv-able. Originally found in Eng. only in words from OFr. but soon by analysis of such instances as pass-able, agree-able, amend-able, treated as a living suffix, and freely employed to form analogous adjectives, not only on vbs. from Fr., but at length on native words, as bearable, speakable, breakable, wearable. This extension seems to be largely due to form-association with the adj. ABLE (to which the suffix is not related), so that eatable, e.g. is taken as eat + able, able to be eaten. The vb. has often a sb. of the same form, as in debat-able, rat(e)-able; these lead the way to such as carriageable, clubbable, where the sb. seems to be the source, and saleable, in which no vb. exists. Recent usage adds -able even to a verbal phrase as get-'at-able, come-'at-able. Now always with passive sensc, but in carly words often active, as in comfortable, suitable, able to comfort, suit.

aboard (ə'bɔəd, ə'bɔ:d), adv. and prep. Also 5–7 abord(e, 6 abrode, aburd, 6–7 aboord(e, 7 abourd, and incorr. abroad. [f. A *prep.*¹ + BOARD, and Fr. à bord, to which apparently the modern use of aboard, on board, is chiefly due. Board is orig. Teutonic: in OE., bord a plank, table, shield, and poetically a ship, whence on borde in ship. But this poetic form seems to have died out with OE., the ordinary ME. prose being within shippes borde, within the ship's boarding or sides. Meanwhile the Teut. bord, OHG. bort, had been adopted in Fr. as 1. board, plank, whence the boarding or sides of a vessel; hence, 2. the vessel itself, and, 3. the side or border of anything, edge, coast, shore. À bord, in or on a ship; bord à bord, board to board, side by side, hard aboard, touching; venir à bord, to come a-shore, to land; aborder to come to the side of; abord, approach, accosting. These uses and phrases were adopted in Eng. where also from the use of board in within shippes borde, etc., a-board was very soon regarded as the Eng. prep. a + board, and expanded passim into on board.] about (ə'baʊt), adv. and prep. Forms: 1–2 on-bútan, a-bútan, a-buton; 2–3 a-buten, abuuten; 3 abute; (4 abote;) 4–5 abouten, abowten; 4–6 aboute; 5 (abought, abowght); 6– about. North.: 3 abut; 4 about, obout, abowt (with final e already dropped). By-form, 5 abowtes, abouts, with genitival ending. [OE. on-bútan (cf. OFries. abûta), f. on in, on + bútan without, outside of (itself an earlier comb. of be by, near, + útan properly locative of út out, used adjectively or substantively; cf. be northan, etc.) The primary meaning of on-bútan was thus, on or by the outside of, hence around, wholly or partially. The idea of round, about, was originally expressed in OE. by ymbe, and its compound ymb-útan; the latter scarcely survived the 11th c., and the former became obs. in the 13th, about taking the place of both. The weakening to a-bútan began in the 10th c. Mod. poets have sometimes 'bout. The word was from the first used without (adv.) or with (prep.) an object; the latter in the accus. or dat. The adverbial and prepositional uses are here separated, but the distinction is one of construction rather than of meaning, and it often melts away: see A 3, B 9.]

above (ə'bʌv), adv. and prep. Forms: 1–2 (bufan, bufon); 2 (bufen, buven, buuen, buuenne), abufan; 3 (buven, buve), abuuen, abuue; 3–4 (boven), aboven; 4–5 abouen, abowen(e; 4–7 aboue; 5 abouyn, aboun; 6 abowe (abuffe, aboufe, abofe, aboif); 4– above. North.: 4 abouen, obowen; 4–6 abown(e, aboun, abone; 6– abune, abuin, aboon. [f. A prep.[1], on, + bufan above, atop (cf. ODu. and MLGerm. boven), itself an earlier comb. of be 'by, near, about' + ufan adv. 'up, above' (cf. Germ. oben), properly locative case of uf- (Goth. uf) up, upward. The simple ufan originally expressed the whole idea of its successive expansions b(e)ufan, a-b(e)ufan. A-bufan did not appear till the 12th c., and was evidently a northern formation, being rarely found out of northern or north-eastern writers before the end of the 13th, when it generally replaced bufan, which as bove became obs. in the 14th. 'Bove is also an occasional aphetism of above in modern poets. For the illustration of the senses, bove and above are here taken together, though formally distinct words. A parallel compound of bufan was bibufen = BEBOVE; cf. a-fore, be-fore; of ufan, an-ufan, ANOVE(N. Bufan was used in OE. without (adv.) or with (prep.) an object; the latter in the dative. A-bufan was at first adverbial, but soon acquired the prepositional use of bufan. The adverbial and prepositional constructions are here separated, though in the development of meaning they form historically only a single series; and, as in ABOUT, in certain modern uses, the grammatical distinction melts away; see B 8.]

1858 MANSEL Bamp. Lect. (ed. 4) ii. 30 By the Absolute is meant that which exists in and by itself, having no necessary relation to any other being. 1869 J. MARTINEAU Ess. II. 269 Schelling has vindicated the possibility of knowing the absolute. 1875 H. E. MANNING Holy Ghost xii. 325 There has sprung up..a school of men who tell us that the Absolute is unknowable, and that we can therefore know nothing of God.

14. Metaph. Capable of being thought or conceived by itself alone; unconditioned.

1853 SIR W. HAMILTON Discuss. App. I. To Cusa we can indeed articulately trace, word and thing, the recent philosophy of the Absolute. 1856 FERRIER Inst. Metaph. 370 Whatever can be known (or conceived) out of relation, that is to say, without any correlative being necessarily known (or conceived) along with it, is the known Absolute. Ibid. (ed. 2) 10 Another phantom is a mask, or rather a whole toy-shop of masks, which philosophers have been pleased to call the 'Absolute'; but what they exactly mean by this name—what it is that is under these trappings,—neither those who run down the incognito, nor those who speak it fair, have ever condescended to inform us.

15. Metaphys. Considered independently of its being subjective or objective.

1809–10 COLERIOGE Friend (ed. 3) III. 212 The absolute is neither singly that which affirms, nor that which is affirmed; but the identity and living copula of both. 1858 R. A. VAUGHAN Ess. & Rev. I. 57 Schelling pronounced the subject and object identical in the absolute. 1860 —— Ho. w. Myst. (ed. 2) I. 213 Shake off that dream of personality, and you will see that good and evil are identical in the Absolute.

¶ In the last three uses the word approaches the character of a substantive, as the name of a metaphysical conception: the Absolute, i.e. that which is absolute.

16. In specific combinations with sbs., as absolute contraband, drought, initials, majority, zero, etc. (see the sbs.); also absolute address Computing, an actual address, as determined by the hardware of a computer; an address expressed in machine language; cf. relative address s.v. abstracting (æb'stræktɪŋ), vbl. sb. [f. ABSTRACT v. + -ING¹.] The act or process of withdrawing, separating, taking away, or forming abstract notions. (Now mostly gerundial.)

1690 LOCKE Hum. Underst. (ed. 3) II. xi. 76 The power of Abstracting is not at all in them [the beasts]. 1879 J. WRIGHTSON Farming etc. in Cassell's Techn. Educ. IV. 108/2 We conclude.. by abstracting a sentence or two from Mr. H. N. Jenkins's report.

abstraction (æb'strækʃən). [a. Fr. abstraction (14th c. in Littré), ad. L. abstractiōn-em, n. of action f. abstract-us, pa. pple. of abstrahĕre; see ABSTRACT.]

1. The act of withdrawing; withdrawal, separation or removal; in modern usage euphem. secret or dishonest removal; pilfering, purloining.

1549 Compl. of Scotl. (1873) i. 19 He dois chestee them be the abstraction of.. superfluite. 1660 R. COKE Power & Subj. 122 I say, Justice must have.. abstraction from all affections of love, hate, or self-interest. 1794 PALEY Evid. (1817) II. ii. 65 Amongst the negative qualities of our religion.. we may reckon its complete abstraction from all views of ecclesiastical or civil policy. 1818 FARADAY Exp. Res. vi. 13 He there states its production to be dependent on the abstraction of ammonia by the atmosphere. 1823 LAMB Elia (1865) Ser. II. vii. 284 He robs nothing but the revenue, —an abstraction I never greatly cared about. 1848 MILL Pol. Econ. 5 (1876) A wrongful abstraction of wealth from certain members of the community.

†2. 'Abstraction, in chemistry, denotes the drawing off, or exhaling away, a menstruum from the subject it had been put to dissolve. Some also use the word as synonymous with distillation or even cohobation.' Chambers Cyc. Suppl. 1753.

3. The act or process of separating in thought, of considering a thing independently of its associations; or a substance independently of its attributes; or an attribute or quality independently of the substance to which it belongs.

1647 H. MORE Poems 126 Next argument let be abstraction, When as the soul with notion precise Keeps off the corporal condition. 1710 BERKELEY Hum. Knowl. I. §5 Can there be a nicer strain of abstraction than to distinguish the existence of sensible objects from their being perceived. 1782 PRIESTLEY Mat. & Spir. I. x. 113 Mr. Locke.. observed.. that abstraction is nothing more than leaving out of a number of resembling ideas what is peculiar to each. 1855 BAIN Senses & Intell. (1864) III. iv. §17. 606 The first in order of the scientific processes is Abstraction, or the generalizing of some property, so as to present it to the mind, apart from the other properties that usually go along with it in nature. 1859 SIR W. HAMILTON Lect. on Metaph. II. xxxiv. 285 Abstraction is thus not a positive act of mind, as it is often erroneously described in philosophical treatises, —it is merely a negation to one or more objects, in consequence of its concentration on another.

4. The result of abstracting: the idea of something which has no independent existence; a thing which exists only in idea; something visionary.

1644 MILTON Educ. (1738) 136 They present their young unmatriculated novices at first coming with the most intellective abstractions of logic and metaphysics. 1818 HAZLITT Eng. Poets (1870) ii. 44 Death is a mighty abstraction, like Night, or Space, or Time. 1850 GLADSTONE Gleanings V. lxxvi. 218 Laws are abstractions until they are put into exeeution. 1851 MARIOTTI Italy in 1848, i. 4 They can see nothing in it, save only an idle, chimerical abstraction. 1878 G. A. SIMCOX in Academy 605/3 Science, strictly speaking, is an abstraction, and is not and never can be adequate to the whole, even of our experience.

5. A state of withdrawal or seclusion from worldly things or things of sense.

1649 JER. TAYLOR Great Exemp. (1653) 124 Lifted up by the abstractions of this first degree of mortification. a 1744 POPE Let. (J.) A hermit wishes to be praised for his abstraction.

6. The state of mental withdrawal; inattention to things present; absence of mind.

1790 BOSWELL Johnson (Rtldg.) xxiv. 215 As he [Johnson] could neither see nor hear at such a distance from the stage, he was wrapped up in grave abstraction. 1848 L. HUNT Jar of Honey iii. 31 Sir Isaac Newton carried abstraction far enough, when he used a lady's finger for a tobacco-stopper.

7. In the fine arts, the practice or state of freedom from representational qualities; a work of art with these characteristics.

1915 Forum (N.Y.) Dec. 662 Sheeler.. fears to take the final leap into abstraction, not feeling sufficiently sure of his desires. 1921 A. HUXLEY Crome Yellow xii. 117 Soon, he says, tbere'll be just the blank canvas. That's the logical conclusion. Complete abstraction. 1948 R. O. DUNLOP Understanding Pictures iv. 44 Cubism was a half-way house on the road to pure abstraction. 1954 WYNDHAM LEWIS Demon of Progress in Arts I. vii. 29 It is usually those of very little talent who furnish the little crowds of people painting empty abstraetions.

8. Comb. abstraction-monger, one who deals with visionary ideas.

1860 R. A. VAUGHAN Ho. w. Mystics (2 ed.) II. 95 His philosophy is never that of the abstraction-monger.

abstractional (æb'strækʃənəl), a. [f. prec. + -AL¹.] Of or pertaining to abstraction.

1865 MILL Comte 10 Instead of the Theological we should prefer to speak of the Personal..; instead of Metaphysical, the Abstractional or Ontologieal. 1867 H. BUSHNELL Dark Things 300 A result of this abstractional process. 1907 W. JAMES Meaning of Truth (1909) vi. 153 Reduced to a bare abstractional scheme. 1942 Mind LI. 241 Spinoza's constant use of 'quatenus' rather than 'qua' is no mere stylism, but is closely bound up with his rejection of the abstractional view of knowledge.

abstractionism (æb'strækʃənɪz(ə)m). [f. ABSTRACTION + -ISM.] 1. The pursuit or cult of abstractions.

1909 W. JAMES Meaning of Truth xiv. 284 Abstractionism of the worst sort dogs Mr. Russell in his own trials to tell positively what the word 'truth' means. 1914 F. H. BRADLEY Ess. Truth & Reality 143 Prof. James, in Pragmatism.. insists.. on taking the crime in its abstraction as absolutely real. And then he goes on (Hegel would have smiled) to denounce 'abstractionism'.

2. spec. The cult or practice of abstract art.

1926 Lit. Digest 30 Oct. 28/2 Expressionismus, expressionism.. abstractionism, are being tried. 1937 H. READ Art & Society ii. 49 Generally a high degree of naturalism excludes a co-existent abstractionism. 1952 Lit. Guide Apr. 6o/1 Ours is the age of atomic energy.. of psycho-analysis and abstractionism in the arts.

abstractionist (æb'strækʃənɪst). [f. ABSTRACTION + -IST.] 1. One who occupies himself with abstractions; an idealist. Also as adj.

1841 Kendall's Expositor I. 373 There are two sorts of Abstractionists in our country... The Virginia Abstractionist is one who recognizes the obligations of oaths, the duty of obeying the Constitution [etc.]... The Kentucky Abstractionist is one who looks chiefly to abstracting money from the people's pockets for the purpose of building up a Nobility. 1844 EMERSON Ess. Ser. II. viii. 158 She [sc. Nature] punishes abstractionists. 1863 B. TAYLOR H. Thurston I. 37 'And your fanatical abstractionists never look at anything in a practical way!' rejoined the Hon. Zeno. 1930 Time & Tide 24 May 670 Shall I sum up my criticism of Lady Rhondda's attitude.. by calling it too 'abstractionist'? 1945 A. A. LUCE Berkeley's Immaterialism II. 32 Abstractionists are inveterately disposed to think that matter exists.

2. One who practises or advocates the principles of abstract art.

1925 Internat. Studio June 229/2 The extremes are held by those who advocate 'innocence of the eye' and the 'pure abstractionists'. 1934 Burlington Mag. Aug. 94/1 'The Evolution of Abstract Art' is an intelligent statement by one of the most uncompromising of the younger abstractionists. 1950 A. HUXLEY Themes & Variations iv. 184 The pure abstractionist will come forward with a question. Seeing that the non-representational passages in representational works are so expressive, why should anyone bother with representation?

†abstractitious (ˌæbstræk'tɪʃəs), a. Obs. [f. L. abstract-us: see ABSTRACT + -ITIOUS.] Resulting from abstraction.

1742 BAILEY, Abstractitious [in Pharmacy], a term used to distinguish that Spirit which is drawn from Plants naturally abounding with it. 1853 MAYNE Exp. Lex., Abstractitious, old term applied to spirits obtained from plants by distillation, as opposed to that produced by fermentation.

abthain, abthane ('æbθeɪn). [An Eng. or rather Lowland Sc. formation on med.L. abthania, for Gaelic Abdhaine, abbacy or abbotrick, abbatia, variously written in the charters Abthen, Abthein, Abbathain, Abbethayne. The meaning of Abthania being lost, it was supposed to be some ancient dignity, for the holder of which the imaginary title of Abthanus was invented by Fordun (Scotochron. IV. xxxix.), and explained by him from a false etymology as Father (abbas) or Superior of the Thanes. Thenceforward the imaginary Abthane flourished in Scottish History, till the recent explanation of the word by Dr. W. F. Skene in Historians of Scotland IV, Fordun II. 413.]

1. Erroneous use: a 'Superior Thane.'

1535 STEWART Cron. Scotl. II. 620 Duncane his oy succeidit to his ring, His dochteris sone.. Quhilk weddit wes with the Abthan of Dow. 1614 SELDEN Titles of Honor 285 Som interpret their Thane by.. Steward; and deliuer that the chief Steward of Scotland was called Abthan. 1872 SKENE transl. Fordun IV. xxxix, Abthane is the superior of the Thanes, or their lord under the king.

2. Correct use: an abbacy (of the early Scottish church).

1872 SKENE Fordun II. 413 In the Chartulary of Arbroath we have a grant of the 'Ecclesia Sancta Mariae de veteri Munros, cum terra ejusdem ecclesiae, quae Scotice Abthen vocatur,' and in the confirmation by William the Lion it is called 'terra Abbatiae de Munros.' These notices are sufficient to show that the word Abthain was the equivalent Scottice of Abbatia.

¶ If a representative of Gael. abdhaine, abthaine, med.L. abthania, is retained as a special term for 'the territory of those churches called Monasteria, which were founded by the Columban clergy' in ancient Celtic Scotland, the best form would be Abthany, as distinct from the equivocal Abthane and his supposed jurisdiction Abthanry or Abthanage.

abthainry, abthanrie ('æbθənrɪ). Scot. Hist. [f. prec. + -RY.] An abbacy; the territory and jurisdiction of an abbot; also the secular jurisdiction of what were previously abbatial lands. (Erroneously used as the jurisdiction of the imaginary ABTHANE. As the office itself was the Abthaine, the words ABTHAINRY and ABTHANAGE are unnecessary, and should be disused. See note to prec.)

1872 SKENE Fordun II. 413 The following Abthainries appear in the Chartularies and Records: Dull, Abthania, etc. Ibid. 414 The owners of an Abbatia or Abthanrie appear to have occasionally borne the title of Abbe or Abbot.

abthanage ('æbθənɪdʒ). [f. ABTHANE + -AGE.] The jurisdiction of the imaginary ABTHANE. See prec.

1872 E. W. ROBERTSON Hist. Essays 127 A grant..in which the ecclesiastical and temporal prerogatives over a district were alike vested in an abbot, seems to have been often known in early days as an Abthanage.

ac-, pref. assimilated form of L. ad- to, bef. c-(k-) and qu-, as in ac-cumulāre, ac-cēděre, ac-quiescĕre. Reduced in OFr. to a-, and so entered Eng. in 3–4. But in 4–5 the spelling ac- was artificially restored in Fr. in imitation of L., and in 4–5 this extended to Eng. as in ac-count, ac-quit, EE. a-cunte, a-cwite, a-quite. In all modern words from L., ac- is written, though a- only is pronounced. While the refashioning of the OFr. words was going on, ac- was ignorantly extended to some words having a- = OFr. an-en-:—in-, or es-:—ex-, as a(c)cloy, a(c)cumber, a(c)coup, EE. acloye, acumbre, acoupe, OFr. encloer, encombrer, encoulper = L. inculpare, and even to some words with a- = OE. a- or on-, as a(c)curse, a(c)know, a(c)knowledge.

ac-, the earlier spelling of many words, which in consequence of the refashioning mentioned in the prec. are now spelt acc-, under which they will be found.

-ac, suffix formerly -aque, -ak(e, -ack, primarily adj., whence also sb. formative, repr. Gr. -ăκός, -ăκή, -ăκόν, the form of the adj. suffix -κός, in comb. w. sb. in -ια, -ιος, -ιον, as καρδιακ-ός cardiac, of the heart, ἡλιακ-ός heliac, of the sun, δαιμονιακ-ός demoniac, belonging to a demon. Some of these were adopted in L. as cardiăc-us, dæmoniăc-us, elegiăc-us, aphrodīsiăc-us, on the model of which others as maniac-us, iliac-us have been formed in med. or mod.L. Thence they have been adopted in Fr. as learned words in -aque, partly from which, as in demoniac, partly from L. or Gr. they have been adopted in Eng. e.g. ammoniac, aphrodisiac, cardiac, celiac, elegiac, demoniac, hypochondriac, iliac, maniac, prosodiac, zodiac. -acal, compound suffix; consisting of -AL[1] repr. L. -ālis, -āle 'of the nature of, belonging to,' added to -AC (q.v.), which although strictly an adj. ending was so often used substantively, e.g. demoniac, maniac, ammoniac, aphrodisiac, that it became usual to make the adj. in -acal even when no sb. occurs, as heliacal. As in the cogn. -IC, -ICAL, adjectives in -ac are primary objective attributes, of or pertaining to the thing, while adjectives in -acal are only secondary, of the nature of or connected with the attribute in -ac, or its embodiment, hence more remotely and subjectively relating to the thing; e.g. the cardiac arteries, a cardiac (medicine), cardiacal qualities of a herb. But this distinction is not always observed. Examples: ammoniacal, aphrodisiacal, cardiacal, demoniacal, heliacal, hypochondriacal, maniacal, paradisiacal, prosodiacal, theriacal.

acceleratedly (æk'sɛləreɪtɪdlɪ), adv. [f. prec. + -LY^2.] In an accelerated manner; with ever increasing speed.

1751 BLAKE Steam-Eng. Cyl. in Phil. Trans. XLVII. 198 A weight on the piston, driving it to a depth of five feet.. within the cavity of the cylinder; acceleratedly, till friction and an impediment from the steam..shall equal the accelerative force.

accelerating (æk'sɛləreɪtɪŋ), vbl. sb. [f. ACCELERATE v. + -ING^1.] The action or process of quickening, hastening, or causing to happen more speedily. (Now mostly gerundial.) Also attrib., as accelerating chamber, field, tube (see ACCELERATE v. 1 c).

1591 SIR H. UNTON Corresp. (1847) 49 For the accelerating of bothe theise matters, I praie you, faile not to presse the King. 1665 GLANVILLE Sceps. Sci. Addr. 17 The accelerating and bettering of Fruits. 1932 Physical Rev. XL. 23 The method for the multiple acceleration of ions to high speeds..is so arranged that as an ion travels from the interior of one tube to the interior of the next there is always an accelerating field. Ibid. XLII. 902 Charged atoms are accelerated..at each passage through an accelerating chamber. 1942 STRANATHAN Particles xi. 431 The accelerating tube, including a source of ions at one end and the target to be bombarded at the other, must have sufficient length to prevent spark-over along the outside of the tube.

accelerating (æk'sɛləreɪtɪŋ), ppl. a. [f. ACCELERATE v. + -ING^2.] Quickening, hastening, or tending to quicken or hasten. accelerating force: a force that produces continually increased motion.

1829 U. K. S. Nat. Philos. I. I. iii. §25. 9 This peculiar species of motion is therefore called accelerated motion, and the force which produces it is called an accelerating force. 1878 SEELEY Stein iii. 524 England's rapidly accelerating decline, he [Niebuhr in 1828] writes, is a very remarkable and mournful phenomenon.

acceleration (æksɛlə'reɪʃən). [ad. L. accelerātiōn-em, n. of action f. accelerā-re: see ACCELERATE a. and -ION^1. Cf. mod.Fr. accélération.]

1. a. The action or process of accelerating, quickening or hastening. Also spec. of charged particles (cf. ACCELERATE v. 1 c).

1531 ELYOT Governour (1834) 117 Who beholding..the acceleration or haste to his [Cæsar's] confusion, caused by his own edict or decree, will not commend affability. 1663 COWLEY Verses & Essays (1669) 45 A Garden, destined to the tryal of all manner of Experiments concerning Plants, as their Melioration, Acceleration, Retardation, Conservation. 1732 ARBUTHNOT Rules of Diet 266 Those things which take off the Causes of Acceleration retard the Motion of the Blood. 1822 IMISON Sc. & Art I. 84 But the friction of the teeth and the resistance of the air check this acceleration. 1909 H. I. §28 The velocity of a point is said to be accelerated or retarded according as it increases or diminishes, but the word acceleration is generally used in either sense, on the understanding that we may regard its quantity as either positive or negative.

4. Astr. and Physics. Acceleration of the fixed stars; the time (3′ 55·9″) which the stars gain upon the sun in passing the meridian each day, or by which the sidereal day is shorter than the solar, due to the advance of the earth in her orbit while revolving on her axis. Of the planets, the increased velocity with which they advance from aphelion to perihelion. Of the moon, an increase (of about 11″ in the century) in the rapidity of the moon's mean motion, discovered by Halley. Of the tides, the amount by which from special causes, high or low water occurs at any place before the calculated time.

1849 MRS. SOMERVILLE Connex. of Phys. Sc. §5. 43 This secular increase in the moon's velocity is called the Acceleration.

accelerative (æk'sɛlərətɪv), a. [f. ACCELERATE v. + -IVE; as if ad. L. accelerātīvus*.] Pertaining or tending to acceleration; quickening; adding to velocity.

1751 BLAKE Steam-Eng. Cyl. in *Phil. accent ('æksənt), sb. [a. Fr. accent, OFr. acent:—L. accent-um f. ad to + cantus singing, a literal rendering of Gr. προσῳδία, f. πρός to + ᾠδή song, lit. 'song added to' sc. speech: see note under sense 1.]

1. A prominence given to one syllable in a word, or in a phrase, over the adjacent syllables, independently of the mode in which this prominence is produced.

Accent in Gr. (προσῳδία) is explained by Dion. Hal. περὶ συνθέσεως ὀνομάτων ch. xi. as a distinct difference of musical pitch in pronouncing the syllables of a word, those having the grave or heavy accent (βαρεῖα gravis) being spoken at a comparatively low pitch, those having the acute or sharp accent (ὀξεῖα acūtus) being spoken as nearly as possible a musical Fifth higher (διὰ πέντε), and those having the circumflex accent (περισπωμένη circumflexus) beginning in the high pitch and descending a Fifth during the pronunciation of the same syllable. The same three varieties occurred in Latin, but their positions in a word followed very different laws. This variety of pitch disappeared for both Latin and Greek towards the end of the Third Century A.D. when the feeling of quantity was lost, and the high pitch in Greek and Latin became merely greater force, and this stress accent has remained the substitute for musical accent in modern Greek, in Italian and Spanish, and is also found in German and English. In Swedish and Norwegian a musical syllabic accent remains in use; in Danish it is replaced in some circumstances by a peculiar catch, and in others by stress, as in English. In French, where probably stress was at one time strongly marked, the difference for at least three centuries has been so slight that writers have disputed as to its nature and the position of the stress syllable. In all languages having the stress, a variable alteration of pitch and quality of tone always prevails, and is used to express varieties of feeling. This expression belongs to rhetoric. The grammatical varieties of accent in English are great, but are all varieties of stress. The position is fixed in words of more than one syllable. Monosyllables have various degrees of stress according to circumstances. Hence the distinction of syllabic accent for the first, and verbal accent, phrase accent, or emphasis for the second. (A. J. Ellis.)

1581 SIDNEY Def. Poesie (1622) 529 Though we doe not obserue quantitie, yet we obserue the accent very precisely. 1589 PUTTENHAM Eng. Poesie (1811) II. vi. 65 To that which was highest lift vp and most eleuate or shrillest in the eare, they gaue the name of the sharpe accent, to the lowest and most base because it seemed to fall downe rather than to rise vp, they gaue the name of the heauy accent, and that other which seemed in part to lift vp and in part to fall downe, they called the circumflex, or compast accent: and if new termes were not odious, we might very properly call him the (windabout) for so is the Greek word. a 1637 B. JONSON Eng. Gramm. (1696) All our vowels are sounded doubtfully. In quantity (which is time) long or short. Or, in accent (which is tune) sharp or flat. 1748 J. MASON Elocution 26 When we distinguish any particular syllable in a word with a strong Voice, it is called Accent; and when we thus distinguish any particular Word in a Sentence it is called Emphasis. 1871 EARLE Philol. Eng. Tongue xii. 525 Accent is the elevation of the voice which distinguishes one part of a word from another.

2. a. The marks by which the nature and position of the spoken accent were indicated in a word.

The old Latin forms (´) acūtus, (`) gravis, (ˆ) circumflexus, are retained, but each one now represents mere stress, except in works on elocution where (´) now generally represents a rising (not a fixed high) pitch; (`) a falling pitch (the ancient circumflex), and (ˆ) a rising followed by a falling pitch, not used in ancient Latin and Greek. Some writers use (ˉ) for length only, the same as (¯). The old meanings are quite lost. (A. J. E.)

b. Marks used to distinguish the different qualities of sound indicated by a letter, called diacritical accents.

The old ´ ` ˆ are mostly used, as French e é è ê in je, été, tiède, même, but a great variety of other signs have also been introduced. These diacritical accents sometimes distinguish meaning only, as French a à, la là. These marks are not used in English orthography. But sometimes ` is used to shew that -ed is to be pronounced as a distinct syllable, as learnèd, hallowèd, and some write é for a final e pronounced, as Hallé (properly German Halle). (A. J. E.)

Brit. Tongue* (1865) 22 The grave accent is never noated, but onelie understood in al syllabes quherin the acute and circumflex is not. 1807 ROBINSON Archæol. Græca v. xiii. 470 The ancient Greeks used no accents, which are supposed to have been invented and introduced about two hundred years before Jesus Christ. After the Greek language became the favourite study of foreigners, it was necessary to facilitate the pronunciation of it by applying marks of accent for that purpose: and this, very probably, induced Aristophanes of Byzantium to invent and introduce those accentual virgulae.

c. Marks of various kinds placed over and under the consonants in Hebrew, serving as signs of tone and of interpunctuation; hence fig. the minutest particular (of the Mosaic law).

3. The mode of utterance peculiar to an individual, locality, or nation, as 'he has a slight accent, a strong provincial accent, an indisputably Irish, Scotch, American, French or German accent.' Without defining word: of a regional English accent.

This utterance consists mainly in a prevailing quality of tone, or in a peculiar alteration of pitch, but may include mispronunciation of vowels or consonants, misplacing of stress, and misinfiection of a sentence. The loeality of a speaker is generally clearly marked by this kind of accent. (A. J. E.)

6. Prosody. The stress laid at more or less fixed intervals on certain syllables of a verse, the succession of which constitutes the rhythm or measure of the verse.

English verse is theoretically marked by a periodical recurrence of strong syllables, having a loud stress, a certain number of times in a line, separated by one or two weak or unaccented syllables. The habits of poets do not however carry out this theoretical law. Thus in 'to err is human, to forgive divine,' theory would require to to be strong; similarly in 'for the poor craven bride*groom said* never a word,' theory would require the first syllable in craven to be weak and both groom and said to be as weak as the -ver and a which follow. They are not so. Hence has arisen the conception of rhythmically or metrically accented and unaccented syllables, as distinguished from the grammatically or verbally accented syllables. Thus, in the above examples, to has the rhythmical and not the verbal or phrase accent, and craven has the syllabic but not the rhythmical accent; err has both verbal and rhythmical accent, divine has both syllabic and rhythmical accent. (A. J. E.)

Accent in Metre may fall on syllables that have not a distinct word-accent. We can never have three consecutive clearly pronounced syllables without a Metrical Accent.

7. Music. Anciently: the marks placed over words to shew the various notes or turns or phrases to which they were to be sung, these generated the neumes and the latter the notes. In modern music: stress recurring at intervals of time which are generally fixed, but may be varied by syncopation and cross accentuation.

accessary ('æksɪsərɪ, æk'sɛsərɪ), sb. and a. [f. ACCESS sb. + -ARY, as if ad. L. accēssāri-us*, an analogical formation on accēssus, cf. emissary, commissary, adversary, notary. The sb. is etymologically accessary and the adj. accessory, cf. emissary sb., promissory adj., but as the adj. was first taken directly from the sb. it was naturally spelt accessary. Being afterwards 'rectified' by scholars to accessory, after the L. accessōrius, it drew the noun after it, so that this also is now often spelt ACCESSORY. In the legal sense the word is commonly accessary (though Blackstone wrote accessory), and Webster recommends that it be so preserved, and spelt accessory in other senses. But as it is often used of things fig. from the legal sense, as in accessary and principal, it is doubtful if the distinction is practicable. The historical and etymological pronunc. is 'accessary, but ac'cessary (cf. inter'cessory) is also in use. So with its derivatives.]

¶ The preposition used after the passive accompanied is still somewhat unsettled. As in passives generally, it was formerly with; but by is now always said of personal agents, and, it appears, of things personified or viewed as active agents: 'He was accompanied by two policemen,' 'a ship accompanied by several native junks.' When accompany is used causally, with introduces the secondary agent or instrument, as 'he accompanied the word with a blow;' and this is of course retained in the passive, 'the word was accompanied with a blow (by him).' Hence with is used in the passive whenever the agency may be looked upon as merely secondary, or as an accompaniment rather than a companion, even though no primary agent is expressed, 'The operation was accompanied with much pain.' Cf. associated, combined with; attended with pain, by satellites; followed by unpleasant symptoms.

4. Anything that completes, finishes off, or completely equips. a. Formerly including bodily equipment, accoutrement; b. now, a faculty or quality that completes or perfects a person for society—that adds delicacy of taste and elegance of manners to accuracy of knowledge and correctness of thought. As such faculties, besides accomplishing or perfecting their possessor, are usually also accomplished or attained by study and practice, as in sense 3, the common modern use of the word combines the two senses in that of 'an ornamental attainment or acquirement,' i.e. some study accomplished which accomplishes the student. The word is also abused to mean 'superficial acquirements,' embellishments that pretend to perfect or complete an education which does not exist.

1605 BACON Advanc. Learn. II. 2 Conduits, Cesternes, and Pooles .. men haue accustomed .. to beautifie and adorne with accomplishments of Magnificence and State, as well as of vse and necessitie. 1641 MILTON *Ch. -ācea, L. suffix, pl. neut. of -āceus, comp. adj. formative (= -āc- + e-us) = belonging to, of the nature of: see -ACEOUS. The analogy of a few words in L., as gallīnāceus, has been followed in the extensive use of this ending (in neuter pl. agreeing with animālia understood) to form names of classes or orders of animals, like Crustācea crusty or shell-coated animals, Cētācea animals of the nature of the whale (cētus). These are collective plurals; the sing. is supplied by crustaceous animal, crustacean.

-āceæ, L. suffix, pl. fem. of -āceus, as above. The analogy of L. words like herbāceus, rosāceus, violāceus, hordeāceus has been followed in the unlimited use of this ending (in fem. pl., sc. plantae) to form collective names of orders or families of plants, as Rosaceae, Geraniaceae, Algaceae, Graminaceae, etc.

-ācean, comp. adj. (or sb.) formative, f. L. -āceus + -AN. As an adj. = -aceous; as a sb. it supplies a sing. to collective plurals in -acea, as a crustacean = a crustaceous (animal), one of the Crustacea.

acer ('eɪsə(r)). Also Acer. [a. L. acer maple.] A tree or shrub of the genus of this name: = MAPLE 1. Also, the wood of the maple.

1878 R. THOMPSON Gardener's Assistant (new ed.) 929/1 (Index), Acers for chalk soil. 1912 H. H. THOMAS Compl. Gardener xxv. 344 Among the Acers are some handsome trees and shrubs. 1958 Listener 18 Sept. 430/1, I have seen these flowers used for table decoration,..with coloured acer leaves—that is the Japanese maple—and ivy trails. 1977 Early Music July 453/2 (Advt.), Tonewoods for musical instrument makers. We specialise in acer (maple, sycamore), spruce, rosewood, etc. 1983 P. BALLARD Oasis of Delight i. 28/2 The collection of ornamental trees had a large group of acers.

aceramic (eɪsə'ræmɪk), a. Archæol. [f. A- 14 + CERAMIC a.] Lacking pottery; characterized by the absence of pottery remains. spec. applied to early (pre-pottery) Neolithic culture; also absol.

1961 J. MELLAART in Anatolian Stud. XI. 70 The top of this aceramic mound showed all the signs of prolonged denudation. Ibid. 73 A long early pottery-Neolithic must..be intercalated between the beginning of Late Neolithic..and the Aceramic. 1967 Listener 30 Mar. 426/3 The Sarakatsani might be described as aceramic Neolithic for they have domestic animals and no pottery. 1978 Antiquaries Jrnl. LVIII. 137 The earlier phases were virtually aceramic, despite prolific deposits of domestic debris. 1980 Glasgow Archaeol. Jrnl. vii. 32/1 The mainly aceramic material culture shows strong links with S Scotland.

acerate ('æsəreɪt). Chem. [mod. f. L. acer maple + -ATE⁴.] A salt of aceric acid.

1847 CRAIG, Aceric acid exists in the juice of the maple tree, in the shape of an acerate of lime.

acerb (ə'sɜ:b), a. [ad. L. acerb-us harsh to the taste; cf. mod.Fr. acerbe.] Sour, with an addition of bitterness or astringency, as unripe fruit; also fig. sharp and harsh.

1657 Phys. Dict., Acerb, sowr or sharp. 1661 R. LOVELL Anim. & Min., Some are austere and acerb..as rosted quinces, wardens, services. 1751 CHAMBERS Cycl. s.v., Physicians usually make Acerb an intermediate savour between acid, austere, and bitter. 1766 LEE in *Phil. WHITNEY Other Girls (1876) xviii. 241 A kindlier touch to her antitheses than pertained to those of that acerb damsel.

acerbate (ə'sɜ:beɪt), ppl. a. [ad. L. acerbāt-us pa. pple. of acerbā-re to embitter; see prec. and -ATE².] Embittered, exasperated; severe.

1869 Echo 16 Sept. 1/3 The very faults of a fat man are less acerbate than those of other people.

acerbate ('æsəbeɪt), v. [f. L. acerbāt- ppl. stem of acerbā-re to embitter; f. acerb-us bitter, harsh.] To sour or embitter; usually fig. to exasperate.

[1731 In BAILEY, vol. II. 1818 In TODD n.q.] 1845 LYTTON Zanoni Ep. Ded., The ignoble jealousy and the sordid strife which degrade and acerbate the ambition of Genius. 1862 A. TROLLOPE North Amer. I. 86 The Canadians..have been vexed and acerbated by the braggadocio of the Northern States.

acerbic (ə'sɜ:bɪk), a. [f. L. acerb-us + -IC.] Of a sour, harsh, or severe character. Freq. of speech, manner, or temper: sharp, cutting.

1865 North Brit. Daily Mail 4 Dec., Exaggerated notions are entertained now-a-days regarding the gloomy acerbic nature of Sabbath observance among the ancient Jews. 1971 Times Lit. Suppl. 21 May 582/1 The fury he aroused in the acerbic breast of Karl Marx. 1976 Economist 13 Mar. 33 As defeat in Florida came closer.., his speeches grew less polite and more acerbic. 1984 Washington Post 3 Aug. B7 Although they borrow from Tom Lehrer and Mark Russell.., they are far less acerbic—perhaps because they are part of what they lampoon.

†a'cerbitude. Obs.—⁰ [ad. L. acerbitūdo harshness, f. acerbus.] 'Sourness, harshness in taste, bitterness.' Bailey, vol. II, 1731, and in mod. Dicts.

acerbity (ə'sɜ:bɪtɪ). [a. Fr. acerbité, ad. L. acerbitāt-em, n. of quality f. acerb-us ACERB.]

1. Sourness of taste, mingled with bitterness or astringency; harshness, roughness of taste.

1611 COTGR., Acerbité: Acerbitie, sharpnesse, sournesse. 1620 VENNER Via Recta vii. 113 By reason of their acerbity, they are soone offensiue to the teeth. *a*1735 ARBUTHNOT Aliments, in Philol. Anglic., Fruit, especially unripe fruit, has a degree of acerbity in it. 1814 Edin. Rev. XXIII. 118 Salt communicates an unpleasant acerbity to substances.

2. fig. Of men, their words and actions: Sharpness mingled with bitterness, keen harshness.

1572 G. BUCHANAN in Knox's Wks. (1846) I. 29 Thai ar in consultation to mitigat sum part the acerbite of certain wordis. 1626 T. aceric (ə'sɛrɪk), a. [ad. mod.L. aceric-us, f. acer maple; see -IC.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to the maple. aceric acid, an acid which exists in the sap of the maple.

1847 CRAIG. (See under ACERATE.)

acerose (ˌæsə'rəʊs), a. [ad. L. acerōs-us chaffy, f. acus, acer-is chaff; apparently afterwards referred in error to acus, acu-s a needle or acer sharp; whence sense 2 in which it has been used by botanists since Linnæus. See Phil. Botanices pp. 42, 219.]

1. Chaffy; like, or mixed with chaff.

1721 BAILEY, vol. II. 1775 ASH, and mod. Dicts.

2. Bot. Needleshaped and rigid; as in the leaves of heaths and pines.

1785 MARTYN Rousseau's Bot. (1794) xxviii. 445 The leaves of all these are linear and permanent; Linnæus calls this sort of leaf acerose. 1870 BENTLEY Bot. 159 When a linear leaf terminates in a sharp rigid point like a needle, it is acerose or needle-shaped.

acerote, a. [? mispr. for ACEROSE in sense 1.]

1612 COCKERAM, Acerote bread, Browne bread.

acerous ('æsərəs), a. Bot. [f. L. acerōs-us, as if ad. Fr. acéreux.] = ACEROSE.

1847 In CRAIG; and in mod. Dicts.

Anat.* (ed. 9) II. 327 The follicles [of the pineal]..often contain..much gritty calcareous matter (acervulus cerebri, brain sand), composed of microscopic particles.

2. Bot. A flat mass of fungal conidiophores embedded in the tissue of the host plant.

1872 W. A. LEIGHTON Lichen-Flora Gt. Brit. (ed. 2) p. xvi, Acervuli, little heaps or clusters. 1931 CLEMENTS & SHEAR Genera of Fungi 196 Melanconiaceae..Strata typically bearing simple or ramose basidia upon which the conidia arise, forming acervuli or masses, which are immersed or erumpent. 1947 C. E. SKINNER et al. Henrici's Molds, Yeasts, & Actinomycetes (ed. 2) v. 96 The third order, the Moniliales.., contains the remaining forms, whose conidiophores are produced neither in pycnidia nor upon acervuli, but are formed from superficial hyphae over the entire surface of the fungus colony. 1972 E. MOORE-LANDECKER Fundamentals of Fungi v. 139 Conidiophores may be produced as part of a distinct nonsexual fructification that resembles an ascocarp. These include the acervulus, an open mass of closely packed conidiophores which may form a flat discoid cushion of spores.

acescence (ə'sɛsəns). [a. mod.Fr. acescence, f. acescent, after nouns in -nce:—L. -ntia: see ACESCENT and -NCE.] The action of becoming acid or sour; the process of acetous fermentation. (Not in Johnson's Dict., though used by him.)

1765 JOHNSON Note on Shaks., Timon III. i, Alluding to the turning, or acescence of milk. 1791 Edin. New Disp. 39 Glutinous matter seems to run into putrefaction, without shewing any previous acescence.

acescency (ə'sɛsənsɪ). [f. ACESCENT, after nouns in -NCY, ad. L. -ntia; see -NCY.] The quality or state of being acescent, or of turning sour; tendency to sourness; incipient or slight acidity.

1756 C. LUCAS Ess. on Waters III. 333 [It is] from an acrimony, not acescency, of the juices. 1776 WITHERING Arrangem. Brit. Plants (1796) III. 710 The leaves, put into sour beer, soon destroy the acescency. ?1838 Life of Wilberforce 465 All sweetness without the slightest acescency.

acescent (ə'sɛsənt), a. and sb. [a. mod.Fr. acescent, or ad. L. acēscent-em pr. pple. of acēsc-ĕre to grow sour, inceptive of acē-re to be sour; stem ac- sharp, as in ac-id, ac-ute.]

A. adj. Turning sour; or having the tendency to turn acid, or to undergo acetous fermentation, as milk, etc.; hence, slightly sour, 'turned.' lit. and fig.

1731 ARBUTHNOT Aliments, Chem. Terms 29 Substances, which are not perfectly Acid, but naturally turn so, I call Acescent. 1746 R. JAMES *Introd. Resear. xxxi. 174 A disagreeable acescent odour something resembling that of putrescent milk.

B. sb. An acescent substance; one liable to undergo acetous fermentation.

1731 ARBUTHNOT Aliments viii. 213 Animal Diet qualify'd with a sufficient Quantity of Acescents, as Bread, Vinegar, and fermented Liquors.

acet-. Chem. In comb. = ACETIC, ACETYL before a vowel, as in acet-amide, acet-anilide, acet-uric.

acetable ('æsɪtəb(ə)l). [ad. L. acētābulum, now commonly used in the L. form, q.v.]

1. An ancient Roman, and old medical, fluid measure; a saucerful; usually reckoned at $2\frac{1}{2}$ fluid ounces, or one-eighth of a pint.

1551 TURNER Herbal II. 78 An acetable holdeth two vnces and an half. 1601 HOLLAND Pliny XX. xiii, Take a saucer full or acetable of the juice and so drink it with wine.

2. = ACETABULUM 2 b.

1684 tr. Bonet's Merc. Compit. IX. 340 If the Humour run into the Acetable, and force the head of the thigh-bone out.

acetabular (æsɪ'tæbju:lə(r)), a. [f. L. acētābul-um + -AR, as if ad. L. acētābulār-is*.] Cup-like, cup-shaped; sucker-shaped.

1849 MURCHISON Siluria App. 544 The acetabular hooklets of Cephalopods. 1856 WOODWARD Mollusca I. 76 The specimens..show the large acetabular bases of the hooks.

acetabuliferous (æsɪˌtæbju:'lɪfərəs), a. Zool. [f. L. acētābul-um + -FEROUS = bearing.] Bearing acetabula; furnished with fleshy cups or suckers for adhering to bodies.

1836 TODD Cycl. Anat. & Phys. I. 550/1 The nerves are continued of a simple structure as far as the acetabuliferous extremities. 1851 RICHARDSON Geol. viii. 253 There are ten of these acetabuliferous arms. 1877 HUXLEY Anat. Inv. An. viii. 507 Two acetabuliferous tentacles take their origin on the inner side of a cup-like hood.

acetabuliform (æsɪ'tæbju:lɪfɔ:m), a. Bot. [ad. mod.L. acētābuliformis saucer-shaped; see ACETABULUM, and -FORM.] Shaped like a saucer, or shallow cup, as the calyx or corolla of many flowers.

1835 LINDLEY Introd. Bot. II. 352 (1848) Acetabuliform: concave, depressed, round, with a border a little turned inwards; as the fruit of some lichens. 1880 GRAY Bot. Textbk. 394.

‖acetabulum (æsɪ'tæbjʊləm). [L. acētābulum a vinegar cup or saucer, also a saucerful, a liquid measure, and fig. a cup or saucer-shaped cavity; f. acētum vinegar + -abulum dim. of -abrum = a holder or receptacle. Used in Eng. both as the proper name of the ancient vessel and measure, and as a technical term in various sciences.]

1. Rom. Antiq. a. A vessel of porcelain or metal for holding vinegar at table; a cup or cup-shaped vessel. b. A liquid measure of the capacity of this vessel, about half a gill or $2\frac{1}{2}$ fluid ounces.

acetal ('æsɪˌtæl). Chem. [f. ACET(IC) + AL(COHOL).] 1. A colourless liquid with alcoholic smell, found among the first portions of the distillate in preparing spirit of wine; a derivative of aldehyde, converted by oxidizing agents into acetic acid. It is the diethylate of ethylidene or ethidene $CH_3—CH(OC_2H_5)_2$.

1853 URE Dict. Arts (ed. 4) I. 1 Acetal, is the subacetate of ether, having for its chemical symbol $3AcO + AcO_3$. It is a light colourless ethereous liquid. 1869 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. 250 Acetal is isomeric with diethyl glycol.

2. Sometimes extended to analogous ethidene derivatives in other series of the hydrocarbons, as dimethyl acetal, found in crude wood-spirit; also called ethidene dimethylate, $CH_3—CH(OCH_3)_2$. In this nomenclature, the preceding substance is distinguished as diethyl acetal.

acetaldehyde (ˌæsɪ'tældɪhaɪd). Chem. [contr. for acetic aldehyde.] Common or Ethyl aldehyde, viewed as the special aldehyde of the acetic series.

1877 WATTS Fownes' Chem. II. 249 Acetic aldehyde, or Acetaldehyde, also called Ethyl aldehyde, but more generally by the simple name aldehyde.

acetamide ('æsɪtəˌmaɪd, ə'sɛtəmaɪd). Chem. [f. ACET- + AMIDE.]

1. The primary AMIDE in which the replacing acid radical is ACETYL; $C_2H_3O.NH_2$; a white crystalline solid of nearly neutral properties.

1873 WILLIAMSON Chem. §282 Products formed like acetamide by the replacement of hydrogen in ammonia by a radical of chlorous properties are called amides. 1874 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. 354 Acetamide is a colourless solid, fusing at 78°, and boiling at 222°. 1877 WATTS Fownes' Chem. II. 379 Acetamide..crystallizes in long needles.

2. A series of analogous compounds, in which two or all three hydrogen atoms in ammonia NH_3, are replaced by the radical acetyl (diacetamide, triacetamide), or in which one or two are replaced by acetyl, and one or two by other radicals, as ethyl-acetamide, ethyl-diacetamide, etc.

acetaminophen (ˌæsɛtə'mi:nəʊfɛn, əsi:tə'mi:nəʊfɛn). Pharm. [f. ACET- + AMINO- + PHEN-.] (The official U.S. name for) the drug paracetamol.

1960 National Formulary XI (U.S.) 10/2 Acetaminophen Tablets. 1964 Jrnl. Pharmaceutical Sci. LIII. 1280/1 There are many formulations containing aspirin, caffeine, and acetaminophen (APAP). 1974 M. C. (Parade) 27/1 People who drink heavily should not take sleeping pills or large amounts of acetaminophen, an aspirin substitute.

acetanilide (ˌæsɪ'tænɪlaɪd). Chem. [f. ACET(YL) + ANILIDE.] A compound of aniline in union with the radical acetyl, forming an acetamide with the radical phenyl. $C_6H_5.NH.C_2H_3O$. Less correctly acetaniline. Used esp. as an analgesic and antipyretic.

1864 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. 411. 1877 FOWNES Man. Chem. II. 453 Acetanilide, or Phenylacetamide, produced by heating aniline and glacial acetic acid for several hours.. forms colourless, shining, laminar crystals, melting at 112°–113°. 1882 Athenæum 2859, 211 Acetaniline acted on by chloride of lime at a temperature of 270 Cent. produces a beautiful yellow to which the name of flavaniline is given. 1897 Trans. Amer. Pediatr. Soc. IX. 41, I have collected several cases of acetanilide poisoning in children where the drug was used externally as an antiseptic. 1956 Lancet 24 Mar. 339/1 Acetanilide is a dangerous drug because the body de-acetylates part of it into aniline.

acetarious (æsɪ'tɛərɪəs), a. [f. L. acētāri-a see next + -OUS.] Used in salads, as lettuce, cress, etc.

1822 J. C. LOUDON Encycl. Gardening (1835) III. I. viii. §7. 856 The acetarious vegetables are..all articles of comparative luxury, or condiments rather than food. 1832 *Veg. Subst. †'acetars, 'acetaries, sb. pl. Obs. [ad. L. acētāri-a salad plants, prop. adj., neut. pl. of acētāri-s, pertaining to acēt-um vinegar.]

1612 COCKERAM, Acetarr, a salad of smal hearbes. 1657 Phys. Dict., Acetaries, sallets, or herbs mixed with vinegar to stir up appetite. 1676 BULLOKAR, Acetar, a sallad of raw herbs eaten with vineger. 1775 ASH, Acetars, salads and vinegar.

acetary ('æsɪtərɪ). [ad. mod.L. acetārium, f. acēt-um vinegar + -arium receptacle; see -ARY.] 'An acid pulpy substance in certain fruits, as the pear, inclosed in a congeries of small calculous bodies towards the base of the fruit.' Craig 1847.

1674 GREW Anat. Plants I. vi. (1682) 41 Within this lies the Acetary; 'tis allways sour, and by the bounding of the Calculary of a Globular Figure. Ibid. IV. ii. §5. 183 I have taken leave to name it the Acetary. 1753 CHAMBERS Cycl. Supp. s.v., The quince also has an Acetary, resembling, tho' less than, that of a pear.

acetate ('æsɪteɪt). Chem. [f. ACET-IC + -ATE[4].]

1. A salt formed by the combination of acetic acid with an alkaline, earthy, or metallic base; as acetate of lead, called also sugar of lead.

1827 FARADAY Chem. Manip. §10. 253 Nitrate of mercury, acetate of lead. 1869 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. 94 Marsh gas may..be artificially prepared by heating sodium acetate. 1872 WILLIAMSON Chem. §278 The metallic acetates are, for the most part, very soluble in water. 1876 HARLEY *Mat. acetenyl ('æsɪtɪnɪl). Chem. [short for acetylenyl, f. ACETYLENE + -YL.] A name for the univalent group C_2H; = $C \equiv CH$, = ACETYLENE minus one atom of hydrogen; as in acetenyl-benzene $C_6H_5—C \equiv CH$.

1877 WATTS Fownes' Chem. II. 434 Acetenyl-benzene or Phenyl-acetylene..is an aromatic liquid, boiling at 140°.

acetic (ə'si:tɪk, ə'sɛtɪk), a. [mod. f. L. acēt-um vinegar (f. acē-re to be sour) + -IC.] Of the nature of vinegar; pertaining to vinegar. Hence,

1. acetic acid: The special acid of which vinegar is a diluted or crude form, produced by the acetous fermentation of alcohol. Chemically, the monatomic monobasic acid of the ethyl or dicarbon series, $C_2H_4O_2 = C_2H_3O(OH)$, derived from ethyl alcohol $C_2H_5(OH)$ by the substitution of an atom of oxygen for two of the hydrogen of the ethyl. anhydrous acetic acid, a synonym of acetic anhydride; see 2.

1808 HENRY Epit. Chem. (ed. 5) 302 It appears that acetic acid differs from the acetous, only in containing less water and no mucilage. 1814 SIR H. DAVY *Agric. acetifier (ə'sɛtɪfaɪə(r)). [f. ACETIFY v. + -ER¹.] An apparatus for conducting acetous fermentation, and producing vinegar.

1863 Sarson & Son's Circular, This Vinegar is pure as when first drawn from the Acetifiers.

acetify (ə'sɛtɪfaɪ), v. [f. L. acēt-um vinegar + -FY = make.]

1. trans. To subject to acetous fermentation; to convert into vinegar; to make sour.

1872 WILLIAMSON Chem. §277 A stream of wash either fresh or partially acetified.

2. intr. To become sour, to undergo acetous fermentation. Cf. ACETIZE.

acetimeter (ˌæsɪ'tɪmɪtə(r)). [a. Fr. acétimètre, f. L. acēt-um vinegar + mètre ad. Gr. μέτρον a measure.] An instrument for measuring the strength of vinegar or other acids.

1875 URE Dict. Arts I. 16 Acid which contains 40 per cent. of real acetic acid, is in the language of the Revenue, 35 per cent. over proof; it is the strongest acid on which duty is charged by the Acetimeter.

acetimetrical (ˌæsɪtɪ'mɛtrɪkəl), a. [f. prec. + -ICAL.] Of or pertaining to acetimetry; used in the measurement of the strength of vinegar.

1875 URE Dict. Arts I. 16, 1000 grains of the above proof [acid] would require 50 measures of the acetimetrical alkaline solution.

acetimetry (ˌæsɪ'tɪmɪtrɪ). [f. L. acēt-um vinegar + -METRY = Gr. -μετρία measuring.] The determination of the strength of vinegar, or the ascertaining of the degree of sourness or proportion of acetic acid in any substance.

1875 URE Dict. Arts I. 15 (Title of Article).

acetin ('æsɪtɪn). Chem. [f. ACET- + -IN(E = Gr. -ινη daughter, derivative, here used to form a term matching glycerin.] Acetic glycerin; class name of a series of thick oily liquids, formed (by Berthelot) by the action of acetic acid upon glycerin; they consist of glycerin $C_3H_5(OH)_3$ in which one, two, or all the three hydrogen atoms are replaced by the radical acetyl C_2H_3O, the result being mono-, di-, or tri-acetin; the formula of the last is $C_3H_5(OC_2H_3O)_3$.

‖acetonæmia (ˌæsɪtəʊ'niːmɪə). Med. [f. ACETONE + Gr. αἷμα blood.] (See quot.)

1876 tr. Wagner's Gen. Pathol. 577 Acetonæmia is a morbid state.. characterized by the presence of acetone in the blood.

acetonamine ('æsɪtəʊnəˌmaɪn). Chem. [f. ACETONE + AMINE.] A compound amine, obtained by heating acetone with ammonia; two or three of the hydrogen atoms of which are replaced by molecules of acetone, which also lose sufficient oxygen to form water with the hydrogen from the ammonia. Hence di- and tri-acetonamine, with other more complicated compounds.

1877 WATTS Fownes' Chem. II. 263.

acetonate ('æsɪtəʊneɪt). Chem. [f. ACETONE + -ATE⁴.] A salt of acetonic acid.

1873 WILLIAMSON Chem. 295 [Hydric] acetonate is in its composition homologous with lactate.

acetone ('æsɪtəʊn). Chem. [f. ACET(IC) + Gr. -ωνη female descendant; see -ONE.] A colourless limpid liquid related to acetic acid, but containing less oxygen; pyro-acetic spirit. It is the acetic member of the ketones, or ketone of the acetic series, and is also called dimethyl ketone, $CO(CH_3)_2$. Now widely used as an organic solvent and in the preparation of chloroform, etc.

The current spelling ache is erroneous; the vb. being historically ake, and the sb. ache, as in bake, batch, speak, speech. About 1700 the sb. began to be confused in pronunciation with the vb., whence some confusion in spelling between ache and ake; and finally instead of both being written ake—the word that has survived,—both vb. and sb. are now written ache—the word that has become obsolete. That is, the word ache has become obs. and been replaced by the word ake, while the spelling ake has become obs. and been replaced by the spelling ache. For this paradoxical result, Dr. Johnson is mainly responsible: ignorant of the history of the words, and erroneously deriving them from the Gr. ἄχος (with which they have no connexion) he declared them 'more grammatically written ache.' ache (eɪk), sb.[1] Forms: 1 ace, æce, ece; 2–3 eche; 2–9 ache; (4 hacche); 6 atche. [OE. æce is a primary deriv. of vb. ac-an to ACHE, in which, as in parallel forms, the c (k) was palatalized to ch (tʃ), while in the vb. it remained (k); cf. make, match; bake, batch; wake, watch; break, breach; speak, speech; stick, stitch. Occasional early instances of ake as sb. are northern, in which dialect c (k) was not palatalized, cf. make = match, steik = stitch, kirk = church. In 7 the sb. was still atche (ɑ:tʃ, ɛ:tʃ) pl. atch-es (ɑ:tʃɪz, ɛ:tʃɪz), but about 1700 it began to be confused with the vb. as (ɛ:k). The spelling of the latter has in turn been changed to ache, so that though both vb. and sb. are now really ake, both are in current spelling written ache. See prec. The former pronunciation survives in the dialectal eddage = head-ache; cf. Smallage for Small Ache f. ACHE sb.[2] The 'O.P.' rioters, ignorant of the Shaksperian distinction of ake and ache, ridiculed the stage pronunciation of the sb. by giving it to the vb. in 'John Kemble's head aitches.'] A pain; in later usage, a continuous or abiding pain, in contrast to a sudden or sharp one. Used of both physical and mental sensations.
